HAS BURKE CONFESSED.—A recent Chicago despatch says: "It is said—and the information comes straight from those engaged in the prosecution of the men indicted for the murder of Dr. Cronin—that the State has now completed its case against the accused, and is confident of conviction. This was brought about by the squealing of a suspect, and that suspect is Martin Burke. As a matter of course the State will not give out even an inkling of Burke's confession, because they don't want it to get into the newspapers, but it is a fact that the prosecution is jubilant, and certain of the ground it stands upon."

Betsy's Sonnet

TO THE TOBACCO SMOKER. I am not much at makin' sonnets, More at home a-fixin' bonnets, But now I see a cryin' need When victims of the nasty weed Invoke the muse and even dare Their dirty nuisance to compare With the source of many joys, I mean, our dearly-loved boys. On some artificial kind of plan, And never passed thro' that time of noise Which is so natural to "well made" boys. He advises me not to use the press To vent my grief and dire distress, So I tho't I'd try his "tony" style, And lay aside the "uncouth" for awhile. Now I know he'll take advice from me And forever let tobacco be.
