human-interest articles which most editors snap up if they are well done. I found that I could write and sell these almost from the first.

Then one day, oh happy day! A kindly editor in the person of the late J. R. Burnett gave me a cub reporter's job with his paper, The Charlottetown Guardian.

The pay was small potatoes, but it gave me experience which was what I needed for never was a novice greener than I. Without any training whatsoever I'd ventured into a field where even angels sometimes fear to tread. But my boss helped me over many a sticky situation. His criticism of my work was always constructive and a bit hard to take. I was beginning to learn the "tricks of the trade," when Enemy No. 1 put me out of circulation for a long time.

About this time I developed a throat condition which, as the years went by, proved to be another thorn in the path of my progress. Had the Fates marked me for a child of medical experiments? I was strongly advised to visit the Sanatorium for a check-up. I did as my doctors suggested but all the tests showed negative. Then they advised me to winter in the south. I did. I spent a fairly comfortable winter and never had to call a doctor while there.

The following spring I went North and got a job clerking in a small hotel. The manager, once an asthmatic himself, gave me plenty of breaks when the old trouble returned, otherwise I could not have held down the job.

On week-ends, I stayed with a relative who operated a dairy farm in the Mohawk Valley. I liked to putter around his place because when one is raised in the country the love of the land gets in your blood like the gold fever gets into a miner's blood.

My cousin always kept warning me not to put down hay or sweep the dusty stables. He had seen me in some pretty bad spasms, and knew that dust was not good for my ailment. But one week-end when I arrived at his place I learned that he was short-handed. His hired man was off on a binge. I helped him that evening with the milking and next morning. Then, when he took the milk to the factory I climbed a ladder to a cement floor 20 feet below.

When I regained consciousness I was lying flat on my back. I realized something dreadful had happened to me, yet strange to say I experienced no pain. Vainly I tried to get into a sitting position. "There, I must have done it for the next thing I remembered was a strange man bending over me. Beside him stood my cousin and his wife, their faces looking anything but happy. I just couldn't figure out what they were up to.

Now the strange man was on his knees doing something to my leg. I learned afterward it was the village doctor. He had been putting a splint on my broken limb.

On the way to the hospital I can recall the white-coated orderly who sat beside the stretcher asking, "How are you feeling? Any pain?"

"No pain," I said.

"I took little interest in my doctors or nurses. I just wanted to close my eyes and keep them closed. I was living in a strange new world. This new world was so different from the one I was used to that I never wanted to leave it.

CCF National Council Issues Statement

OTTAWA, (CP)—The CCF's national council Monday called on the federal government for emergency communities where industries have been closed down.

The council, in a statement issued after a week-end meeting here, said several communities are undergoing "extreme hardship and suffering."

This was particularly true in Maritimes centres where coal mines had closed and similar situations were developing in some Quebec and Ontario communities wholly dependent on textile plants that had closed.

The council proposed: Immediate special assistance to relieve hardship among families in such communities; a special committee to explore the possibility of establishing other industries; and
