yellowish tinge and when tanned the fur had a tendency to fall out. We understand that there has been a great deal of trouble from the above source, in fact Clifford MacDonald, on a visit to New York recently, conversed with a number of fur merchants who told him they would not handle silver fox because they had so many complaints about the fur falling out. It will probably be in the future that skins of 1952 will be labelled as such and guaranteed, then the buyer will be protected.

Mr. Calbeck also spoke about a recent article in Women's Weekly forecasting an upturn in raw fur activity. This was at the meeting of the American Fur Merchants Association and it was the opinion of President J. D. Silverman that the outlook for the coming season is optimistic. These are his words in part: "There are no terrific inventories of currently stylish furs except in the persian lamb. Ranch mink is next in line but this could be absorbed quickly in one good selling season. Many Russian furs will be unobtainable.

"Supplies of all other furs now being used are spread out very thinly. Manufacturers' inventories for ones are very low in both garments and skins. While business is stagnant this means nothing, but women are definitely going to buy fur garments and more cloth coats are going to be fur trimmed this year. When this trade starts to function normally the demand for furs will increase and buyers will find prices firmer. We have definitely passed the low point and are on the way up."

A comparative style show will be held at the Hotel Governor Clinton in New York on June 10th. The garments will be made to retail at $300 or less and it is hoped to interest retail buyers from all over the country in a wide variety of popular price garments. These showings will be held in the Governor Room three times weekly. They will be for buyers and the press.

On June 11-12-13 personal showings of all garments will continue in the Florentine Room so that additional buyers can inspect the lines. Ten different furs will be included in the fashion show which will display between 80 and 100 skins. The promoters hope to demonstrate to the buyer how he can stock a fine line of popular price furs that are priced right and are appealing to the consumer.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Part One

"What's this I hear about you throwing a scare into your husband?" she demanded sternly.

"I'm afraid you were right, Miss Hartigan—things proved too much for me."

Bright blue eyes peered at her through the semi-zoom. "Just call me Abby, everyone does eventually."

"All right, Abby—I'm Janet." "Just lie back and relax, I'll take over the children. I'm rather used to them. Which room shall I take? Is one of these the Doctor's, or do you share this one?"

"Richard sleeps downstairs off the den," Janet explained. "We felt someone should be near the children at night."

"I suppose so." Abby's eyes were surprised and disapproving. "That's no way to begin your married life." She seemed to say.

"There are five other bedrooms," Janet said. "Take your pick. They are all old-fashioned as you know, but you can fix yours up to suit yourself. We'll discuss the financial arrangement later, Abby."

"Financial arrangement! Dear child, I'm not doing this for money! Granduncle Sean left me four hundred a month, remember? Room and board and friendship are all I want in return."

"But, Abby—" "Say no more about it." Suddenly Abby slapped her suit pocket, then switched on the bedside lamp and handed Janet several letters. "Gemin! I almost forgot—met the mailman driving in and he gave me these."

There was just one for Janet, the others, mostly bills, were for Richard. One caught her eye—the writing was round and somewhat adolescent, the address on the back Naomi Farquhar's!

She gave Abby the letters to give to Richard.

"Half an hour later he came into her room. He was wearing his raincoat over his tweeds and he was freshly shaved. "Something has come up," he said vaguely, "I'm driving into town—be back in a couple of hours. Get some rest and don't worry—your Miss Hartigan has the children under control."

"Don't worry," she thought wearily, "don't worry, when you're going in to see Naomi Farquhar."

Janet Eynon rose from her enforced rest, feeling stronger and more able to accept the challenge that five actively convalescing children could issue.

Even the knowledge that Richard had heard from Naomi Farquhar had not prevented her from sleeping. She had been too bone-weary for the incident to make a very deep impression. Now it seemed merely like a strangely unforgettable dream.

She was more curious than upset. What could Naomi want with Richard now? Even though she had admired him, he was, after all, a married man.

Unless— Could Richard have told her about their marriage being one in name only? He had denied it the day of their wedding, but he had been in to town frequently since then, and since he had maintained his position at Cosmopolitan for a month, it was probable that he had seen Naomi often. After all, she had felt it incumbent to inform Cliff Bronson.

She found herself thinking of Cliff more and more. Wondering how his work was progressing, how he was taking her absence. Through Richard she learned that Cliff had taken over some of his work in the clinic. What a comdown—treating mumps and chicken pox and poison-ivy when his heart was in surgery! But it was good training for him just the same.

Once he had telephoned, saying he would like to call, and Janet, suddenly having a groundless fear that there would be a scene with Richard, had asked Cliff to postpone his visit until Oakhart was in operation and he could see all the changes that had been made.

He had not called since then. She was almost afraid to face him now for fear that her love for Richard would betray itself. Cliff's mocking, "I told you so," would be more than she could stand. He had been so right concerning her; not so Richard. He remained unchanged.

The laboratory was dark, all curtains were drawn down against the light. Richard had the X-rays of Rodney Becker's chest in the frame and was peering at them intently.

"Richard, wouldn't it be wonderful if something could be done about his heart?" She found herself thinking of Rodney often, fearful that his illness might be having a bad psychological effect on him.

"If it's what I think, there are only three doctors in the country who have performed the operation but fortunately Rodney's parents can afford the best."

"Is that why you went into town yesterday?"

"That and other reasons. "Why?" "I thought you might have gone in to see Naomi Farquhar."

His laugh sounded guilty. "Did I marry a psychotic?" "Abigail brought me the mail first—I couldn't help but see Naomi's letter to you."

"Oh, Well . . ." he hesitated. "Naomi's coming out here to work."

"Work? How?" "She's majored in child psychology for three years in college. She's anxious to keep up her work this summer, so I asked her to come out in the mornings and take over the children's lessons. She's very good at it—had excellent grades in college."

shrewdly preferred to return a heart to make dummy ruff. South could scarcely refuse to ruff this lead on the board, and next he led a low club toward his nine. East put up the ten and led his last heart, once more shortening dummy's trumps. South now discarded his own last heart on the good eight of clubs, but this did not do him much good. West ruffed the trick with the spade six, cashed the spade ace, drawing dummy's king and South's next-to-last trump, then continued with hearts. East got rid of a diamond and thus, after South had ruffed the heart and taken the diamond finesse, East ruffed the diamond ace and took the rest of the tricks with good clubs. Down three!
