THE COMPOSING ROOM

THE CHANGES BROUGHT ABOUT BY TYPESETTING MACHINES.

The Craftsman Who Superseded the Scribe In Turn Forced Aside by the Modern Operator.

When Gutenberg invented the art of printing from movable type in the early part of the fifteenth century, there were not lacking persons so strongly imbued with superstition as to denounce the art as a new trap set by the Evil One for the destruction of souls, and this in spite of the fact that the first work successfully produced from the printers' hands was a Latin Bible.

The mysteries of the craft in those days were unfolded only to those of high station, and the individuals who were lucky enough to have the secrets imparted to them were looked upon with envy by their less fortunate brethren. The scribe, up to that time the official maker of books, was relegated to the rear, and in his stead appeared the individual—at that time a man of science, later a craftsman, and in our own day a tradesman—known as the compositor.

The composing room of a morning newspaper presented a much different appearance ten years ago from that of to-day. Copy was lifted in those days at two o'clock in the afternoon, and from the hour of the moment of going to press the scene was one of life and animation. The printers, their eyes covered with brown shades, sitting on high stools in front of the composing type in position for printing untouched, and then came a simple improvement 700, not a crushing revolution.

OLD TIME SCENES.

The composing room of a morning newspaper presented a much different appearance ten years ago from that of to-day. Copy was lifted in those days at two o'clock in the afternoon, and from the hour of the moment of going to press the scene was one of life and animation. The printers, their eyes covered with brown shades, sitting on high stools in front of the composing type in position for printing untouched, and then came a simple improvement 700, not a crushing revolution.

About one hundred and fifty men, usually of many nationalities, from the Russian to the West Indian, sat at their desks in a morning newspaper composing room at that time. The dapper graduate of a city printing office could be seen side by side with the Bohemian "tourist" or tramp printer, stories of travel always won him a welcome in any party of printers. The verdant product of the country newspaper was also in evidence, as well as the "panhandler" or chronic borrower, whose time was devoted almost exclusively to printing newspapers in barrooms.

Work was begun daily under the direction of the copy cutter and the chairman, the latter a compositor elected by the printers to represent them in all disputes concerning their work. The chairman took to the copy desk a box filled with ivory balls, each having a number engraved on it. After shaking the box well the copy cutter selected a ball and announced the number of it aloud. The man working on the frame of the corresponding number would be entitled to "start out" or the best piece of "phat" on the desk. The copy was always turned face downward. The men followed according to their numbers and took the impression "take" and you could tell by the expression on an individual's face whether he had fared well or not.

Whoever one had taken copy the chairman called "Time," and a hundred and fifty hands reached almost simultaneously and the box containing the first letter on the copy, and the paper was under way.

MONEY AND EFFORT.

Both Are Wasted in the North Polar Explorations.

It is announced that Mrs. Peary, wife of the Arctic explorer, is about to begin a course of lectures for the purpose of aiding in raising a fund wherewith to defray the cost of bringing her husband from the far north. These relief expeditions have come to be a regular part of Arctic exploration. Under certain conditions subscriptions would come in rapidly, but in the present it does not appear that anything is required beyond what was expected when Peary set sail for the north pole. Therefore it would seem to have been the part of prudence for him to have made provision for his return. Apparently, he did nothing of the kind, raising just enough money to equip his expedition for its outward journey and trusting his return to the generosity and humanity of the public.

But that the Arctic explorer had not a definite idea of how his return was to be secured under such circumstances. No doubt Lieutenant Peary is in earnest in his work and concerned quite as much for science as for fame. But that the best scientific method is to bury himself in the Arctic regions without hope of safety except through an appropriation forced by the popular will, seems a somewhat sufficient reason for being relieved. Peary should not be thus mingled with scientific enthusiasm. If the explorer's friends promised to send a party for his relief, they should have the means to do so.

Of course, Lieutenant Peary will be brought back by the convenience of himself and his friends that he will not be allowed to suffer through need of money is not misplaced, but it is probable that the public will not be so ready to respond to the general opinion as that Arctic exploration is not worth what it costs in cash and in hardship, and those who undertake it hereafter must learn to foot their own bills.

Where Life is Long

It has often been asserted that abnormal longevity is more common among the Russians than any other European nation. From an official report collected from local registers, it now appears that the government of Kiev takes the first place in this respect.

During last year it is officially stated there were fourteen centenarian deaths registered in that government. In the City of Kiev one man died aged 110 years, while within the suburban circle two women died aged respectively 102 and 104 years.

In Breditcheff two men reached the ages of 101 and 114 years, respectively. In Vassilkoff another patriarch died in his 114th year.

In the same district there died a Jewess aged 105; in Sventogrodka, a man of 110 years; in Taraschka another of 115; in Uman two men aged respectively 102 and 102 years; in Radomyzyl a Jew aged 107 and a Christian aged 103; and lastly a man of 105 years died at Tcherkassy.

Here are fourteen persons, dying within the same year and within the limits of one district, whose united ages amount to 1679 years. In comparison with the Saratoff Journals, there is still living in the government an ancient veteran of the First Napoleon's army, formerly Lieutenant Savin, and since 1872 known as Nicolai Alexandrovitch Savin, who has celebrated 125 birthdays.

Had Not Endured the Check. "Excuse me, madam," said the printing-press, "but you have not endorsed this check. If you will write your name on the back of it, it will be all right." "Oh, of course," said the little woman, "I had forgotten." Then she endorsed the check: "Sincerely yours, James Hichaworthy."—Harper's Bazaar.
