VANDERBILT'S RIDE.

HIS HORSE FRIGHTENED BY THE GIRL WHO BECAME HIS WIFE.

How the Commodore's Son Met Miss Kissam—He Proposed at a Picnic—Inscription which William H. Cut Into a Tree to See How It Would Look.

It must have been more than 60 years ago at least that a young man mounted his bay horse early one evening for a gallop through the streets of Albany. The horse was in fine fettle, and the ride was begun with a dash that attracted the attention of all beholders.

Some who hastened to get out of the way predicted disaster if the pace was continued, but the rider smiled at their looks of apprehension as he passed, settled himself a little more firmly in the saddle and increased the speed. He knew a few things about horseback riding himself, and the notion that he could meet with an accident never entered his head.

As he rode the moon arose, creating high lights here and there that contrasted strongly with the darkening shadows. Eventually, perhaps, the young man's sense of delight in rapid motion began to give way to appreciation of the evening's beauties. At all events he slackened the reins a bit as the horse swung round a corner into a side street.

Just ahead in the moonlight he saw a girl upon a crosswalk. At the sudden sound of hoofs she stepped quickly to the shaded footpath. There was a flutter of white drapery, and the horse started violently. A moment later the dashing rider lay prone upon the ground, his clothes torn and himself apparently suffering severely from the sudden contact of his head against a jagged pile of stones.

The girl screamed, but in spite of her fright she hastened to the fallen horse-man's aid. She had hardly reached him when he rose nimbly, brushed the dirt from his clothes and stood smiling before her.

"Are you—are you badly hurt?" asked the girl.

"Why, no; not at all. It was awkward in me to take such a tumble from my horse," said the young man. "I hope I didn't give you too much of a start. Though, Miss—Miss?"

"Miss Kissam," said the girl, demurely finishing his sentence, while her face turned rosy red in the moonlight.

CHARLOTTETOWN Business College Writing Academy

Let the searchlight of practical illumination the dark places of theory. A THOROUGHLY Progressive Practical Institution, in which young men and women are not only taught Book-keeping (in all its applications to commerce) both by single and double entry, but are trained how to do business, by actual business transactions. The students act as buyers, sellers, traders, bankers, book-keepers and accountants, in actual business operations, and the currency issued by the College Bank and the notes issued from the Financiers, are used in bona fide business transactions, just the same as in mercantile and banking houses. Book-keeping in itself may be learned at home, but a knowledge of how to transact business, cannot be thus acquired. That our course system of training is eminently practical write for testimonials from business men, and from students who are now holding lucrative and responsible positions.

SUBJECTS: Book-keeping by single and double entry (theoretical and practical), Actual Business Practice, Business Penmanship, Business Correspondence, Commercial Arithmetic, Commercial Law, Railroad, Steamboat, Banking, (actual practice in the College Bank), Typewriting, Short-hand and Navigation.

FACULTY: L. B. Miller, Principal, Teacher of Book-keeping, Arithmetic, Business Practice, Business Correspondence, Typewriting and Navigation. J. W. Coulson, (Vice Principal), Teacher of Railroad, Steamboat, Banking, Accounting and Actual Business Practice. J. Harry Williams, Teacher of Business Penmanship. Wm. Moran (licensed), Teacher of Short-hand. George S. Inman Esq., (Law Firm McDonald & Inman) Lecturer on Commercial Law.

All interested are cordially invited to call at the college and inspect our system of teaching, and work in general.

As the young man gazed upon her pretty features he suddenly grew faint.

"I—I don't know but I am a bit more shaken up than I thought I was," he stammered, "but—I'll be all right in a moment."

"I do hope it is not serious," said the girl, again blushing vividly. "It was all my fault too. My home is in the next house, and I am sure it would be best for you to go in and rest a little, Mr.—Mr."

"Vanderbilt," responded the youth, in turn finishing an interrogatory sentence: "William H. Vanderbilt—and—possibly it would be well for me to accept your invitation."

So the young man entered the home of the Rev. Mr. Kissam, at that time a well known Lutheran clergyman of the state capital. The minister received his guest hospitably, of course, when the accident was explained, and the girl's mother bustled about to make some simple applications to the horseman's hurts. While his bruises were being attended to young Vanderbilt and the minister engaged in conversation on some topic of the day, in which the mother and the daughter joined, and, all forgetful of his horse, the unexpected guest remained the evening through. When at last he tore himself away, he thought he had never been entertained more pleasantly in his life.

Of course he was invited to call again, and of course he accepted the invitation. In fact his calls at the modest parsonage were exceedingly frequent from that time on, and it was not many weeks before he decided sooner or later to ask a particularly important question of the girl who had frightened his horse, and then another of her father.

It was not until the following July, however, that he was able to muster up enough courage to put these interrogations.

He may not have been a worker in that field before he met Miss Kissam, but it is of record that the following July he acted as superintendent of the Sunday school connected with her father's church, and that the entire school went somewhere on a picnic in that month.

Miss Kissam was a teacher, and both the young folk were naturally kept pretty busy all day long.

But some time before the close of the day they found it possible to take a quiet stroll together afar in the grove where the picnic was held. When they had got away from the others, young Vanderbilt stammered out his story and asked his question. After the story had been listened to and the question answered in the way he wished he took from his pocket a keen bladed penknife and with it carved an inscription in the smooth bark of a maple tree. This inscription read: "Mr. and Mrs. William H. Vanderbilt."

He had cut it just to see how it would look, and its appearance was so gratifying to both the young folk that they remained to gaze upon it long enough to worry the other picnicers about their absence and cause the sending of messengers to find them.

The question that yet had to be put to the clergyman, too, was answered as the young man desired, though perhaps with some hesitancy. Possibly this was in part because of the young man's rather slender financial prospects, for, though his father, the commodore, was already quite well to do, William H. had his own way to make in the world and was known to be somewhat in disfavor at home.

As all the world knows, the young bridegroom's subsequent career was such that the bride's father had no cause to regret the match because his daughter had married a poor man, for he became the richest man of his time. But the pleasantest feature of it all was that, no matter how much William H. Vanderbilt may have merited some of the criticisms showered upon him, his long married life with the clergyman's daughter was not marred by a single discordant note.—New York Press.
