Six Boats Begin Annual Whale Hunt In Pacific

COAL HARBOR, B.C. (CP)—Six sturdy boats hoisted anchor here Wednesday to start the northern Pacific coast's only whale hunt.

They'll range 100 to 200 miles from this shore station deep in Quatsino Sound, on the northwest coast of Vancouver Island, 200 miles northwest of Vancouver.

In a six-months season, 600 or more humpback, finback, sei, blue and sperm whales are expected to fall under their harpoons.

Owned by B.C. Packers Ltd., the six boats carry 150 men in the half-year hunt through the whaling grounds north of the island.

B.C. Packers took over whaling operations in 1948 from another company when the business was about to be written off as a worthless venture.

Since then, only one season has been profitable. But the company continues with a determination to make its large-scale investment worthwhile.

Crews of five vessels harpooned and landed 539 whales last year, in a season cut short two weeks by a Pacific storm.

This year, they've started two weeks ahead of the usual April 1 start, and added a sixth whaler in an effort to show a profit on the 1954 season.

Harpooned whales are towed here for processing. Oil, meat and meal are produced as the company "processes the whole whale."

A spokesman said the company pioneered in developing processes to make salable products from the entire whale carcass. A bone and flesh meal is used for poultry feed liquids become a high-protein cattle feed supplement, the meat makes pet food and so on.

Conventional explosive - headed harpoons are used, after electrically-charged modern harpoons were tried two - years ago. Crews distrusted the electrical weapons.
