SALTED SUICIDES.

A CURIOUS JUDICIAL PROCEEDING IN OLD-TIME FRANCE.

People Who Killed Themselves Were Tried by Jury and their Corpses Sentenced to Ignominious Treatment by Order of the Court.

The embalming of human bodies is there are few physicians, probably, who, if called upon to perform the operation, would be able to do so without consulting their books and reading up on the subject. In olden times the case was different, and in France especially, before the revolution, says a writer in the Revue Scientifique, medical men were frequently called upon to embalm cadavers, although the operation was applied almost wholly to one class of subjects, i. e., to suicides.

"Suicide," says Becaria, "is an offense which it seems to be submitted to no punishment properly so called, since such punishment could be inflicted only upon an insensible or lifeless body, or upon innocent persons. Now, any punishment that might be meted out to the inanimate remains of the culprit would produce no other impression upon the spectators than that which they would experience in seeing a statue flogged."

And yet, according to the custom of Brittany, which was also general in France, if anyone killed himself intentionally, he was hanged by the feet and then dragged like a murderer and his personal effects sold to whosoever wished to purchase them. In some cases he was tied face downward to a hurdle, dragged through the streets by a dung cart driven by the public executioner hanged for three hours by the feet from a gibbet erected in the public place, and then thrown into the sewer. It was also ordered that all remembrance of the deceased should be obliterated and suppressed forever.

But before any such proceeding took place the cadaver was carried to a fair trial before a judge, whose duty it was to begin by making an official inquiry into the circumstances attending the act of suicide, the place where it occurred, the life and habits of the deceased, etc. The having been exhibited to the king's procurer, the nearest of kin and the heirs of the suicide were summoned by trumpet to come forward and provide him with a defender. In case they failed to make their appearance, the judge appointed a counsel for him, whose duty it was to defend his client to the best of his ability by cross-questioning the witnesses for the prosecution and offering all the excuses possible in extenuation of the offense. If the accused was found guilty, he was punished in the manner above described; but if he was adjudged innocent, that is to say, if the act of suicide was decided to have been committed in a moment of insanity, he was buried in a consecrated ground, and it was necessary to preserve the cadaver for the entire length of the trial, which sometimes lasted for several months, so that in case the accused was found guilty he might not escape punishment. Hence the necessity of embalming, or "salting," as it was called.

It appears from the old records that the operation and materials used were as follows: The viscera of the cranial, thoracic and abdominal cavities were removed and the spaces stuffed with wax that had been soaked in a solution composed of one ounce of camphor, two ounces of Sooterine aloes and one gallon of alcohol. Deep incisions were then made in different parts of the body and the latter was packed in with a leaden sheet, which, having been covered and nailed, was formally delivered to the jailer for safe keeping.

This method of preserving cadavers seems to have been successful except in a few instances in which the case against the accused, having been put upon the docket, was not reached for several years, and not disposed of until the offensive state of the remains called attention to the necessity of legal action in regard to them.

Speech of an African Prince. Prince Adeniywa, of Juba Benu, in West Africa, was lately entertained at lunch by the lord mayor of London at the Mansion house, then taken in a state coach to the Guildhall, where he sat through a session of the common council and made speech to it in English, which in the council directed should be entered on its record. Here is the speech: "The Right Honorable Lord Mayor, My Lord and Honorable Members of the Corporation: I feel I shall not be doing justice to myself and people if I were to leave this court without returning you my hearty and sincere thanks for the honor paid me in allowing me here and to seat next the lord mayor. I have been made, while waiting here, to know that the knowledge is power; that free liberty of speech is the great boon of the English nation; that the secret of your greatness is the Bible, and that I was not mistaken when I advised my cousin, the king of Juba Benu, an independent native state, West Africa, to accept a British resident, and place the country under her majesty's protection, and that he will be in his independence to manage the internal affairs of his kingdom. I again return you my sincere thanks, and wish you God's blessing. Good-by."

They Live at Intervals. "Remittance men" is the term applied in British Columbia to sons of Englishmen sent there to learn farming.

"They go about in knickerbockers, big shoes, cloth caps and eyeglasses, paint their faces as long as their remittance lasts. For two weeks before the next check arrives they keep quiet, because they have no money for making it; then—"
