ELLEN'S DIARY

Fathers Treat Families In Advance Of Father's Day

Father's Day? Yes. Past the witching hour it comes in, when the world about is still fast asleep. We shall meet it over the hills of the sunrise.

"What about Father? Who is he? we asked Mack this evening. "My father? Why," he smiled proudly, "he's the best fellow in the whole wide world!"

A pair of fathers in the family treated their children to a pleasant excursion today, one which for the first time set their young feet on the soil of the Mainland. It gave them the thrill and magic of "The crossing" and the wonders of the carterly to explore.

"See, the wharf is moving away from us!" one of the small ones laughed. "And back of it presently we could see the pretty pattern of the Island spruces, reach up along the slopes from the shores. It would be, no matter how far, or how long one of her children had wandered from her, a nice place to come home to, we thought."

"Can you believe it?" Granddaughter queried of (cousin) Gage. "We're actually out on the Strait!" Gage smiled. "He is a dear lad, this Gage of ours. It's much as I thought it would be. It's as though we were in a house." Mack offered. "As of course we are — a house on a boat. And I love it!" he beamed.

"I'd like a long, long sail," Granddaughter said wistfully. "Someday," she smiled, "I just may take a trip on one of 'The Queens'."

"Then you'd better start saving your dimes now," Mack advised soberly. "It will take a heap of money for that!" There was "dat ole tang" of sea-places for us again to enjoy — and the noisy convoy of scavenging gulls among other delights for the children to watch. And so much to prove of the heretofore legend of the spic and span Abegweit, here at first hand.

INDIAN NAME "It's an Indian name, and once that of our Island," Granddaughter commented. "It means, resting or cradled on the waves." Poetic, isn't it?"

"And Jamie, listening in smiled. "Very interesting which was fitted into the scheme of the farming by a capricious but nice whim of the weather that had by showers suspended the field-work for the day, was taking Rob and the younger farmer to a stock sale in Amherst, they being curious to learn something of the Ontario line of cattle offered, and to buy maybe one, or not to buy, at a fancy. James was seemingly relieved this evening to hear news of the latter. "The hay-crop doesn't look too promising at present," he commented. "As things are, we'll have enough mouths to feed through the winter!"
