Opening lead—five of diamonds. It is perhaps redundant to state that each player is dealt thirteen cards and that there are thirteen cards in each suit. Yet the failure to apply this simple fact to the loss of more tricks in the play of the cards than any other one factor.

As an illustration of the point under discussion, we cite today's hand. West led a diamond and East took his A-K and returned a diamond which West ruffed. A spade lead followed, at which point South could be sure of the rest of the tricks provided no club trick was lost.

Declarer drew four rounds of trumps, discarding a club from dummy. All thoughts were now centered on locating the missing queen of clubs. The queen was subject to a successful finesse regardless of which defender had it.

There are two schools of thought in this situation. There are those who argue that the defender who bid is more apt to have a missing queen, and there are those who claim that the defender with the greater number of cards in the suit concerned is more likely to have the queen.

Of course, the two camps are at opposite ends of the pole. The fact of the matter is that very frequently neither camp's contention is applicable, and the proper approach to the matter comes from an entirely different direction.

In this deal declarer learns that East started with five diamonds and four hearts, and followed to one round of spades. Before deciding how to play the clubs, a full count of East's original distribution should be obtained.

This can be done by leading a spade to the ace and ruffing a spade. When East follows each time, it becomes known he was dealt three spades. He cannot therefore have been dealt more than one club in his thirteen cards.

When the ace of clubs is now led and East follows with his whole hand it is accounted for. A club finesse against West is bound to succeed.
