Picture Reproducing Machine Is Invented

MONTREAL (CP) — A machine that economically reproduces black and white or color prints without photo engraving has been invented by a professor at Montreal's Ecole Polytechnique. Jean Charles Bernier, director of the electrical engineering department, says he will make a full announcement about his invention, called Berfax, at a press conference later this week. The device uses 35-mm slides to reproduce prints that can be enlarged up to 32 by 44 inches.

"It is a competitive machine when it comes to photo enlargement and small quantities of reproductions. But it is not designed for newspaper printing. It would not be economical for large quantities." Dr. Bernier started experimenting with printing after noticing the high cost of having 35-mm slides made into prints when he returned from a trip to Europe. He is working on two additional machines.

He says it can be geared to reproduce from positives as well as from negatives. The pictures are printed on paper "much like you would use to write a letter." The paper is not emulsified or treated and poorer quality paper also could be used. Regular printing ink is used for both black and white and colored prints. "The discovery is really the electro-mechanism that deposits the ink in the right amount and in the right place," Dr. Bernier's assistant said Tuesday.
