Peter Thinks Fast

By Thornton W. Burgess

Y-a often find in time of need That wits are far better than speed

Peter Rabbit had been in many tight places since as a small bunny he had started out in the Great World, but never had he been in a tighter place than now. He was running for his life without knowing where there was a single safe-hiding-place near where he could be safe from Reddy Fox. Behind him was Reddy.

Peter was over in the Green Forest where he had no business to be. He was over among the maple trees where Farmer Brown and Farmer Brown's boy were making syrup. Peter had been watching them from behind a big tree at the edge of the little opening or clearing in which was the small house where the syrup was made. He had been so curious that without thinking he had moved right out into the open where he could see better.

Of course Peter hadn't known that Reddy Fox was anywhere in the neighborhood. But Reddy was, and the instant Peter moved Reddy saw him. He at once began to try to creep up behind Peter. Chatterer the Red Squirrel saw him and warned Peter that warning was just in time. Now Peter was running lipperty, lipperty, lip as fast as he could. Behind him a little war Reddy Fox, Reddy's sharp face wore a grin. You see, this time he was sure he would catch Peter. "There isn't any place anywhere near her where Peter can't follow," thought Reddy.

He was dodging around trees now in a way that made it difficult for Reddy to follow.

Peter was a worried Rabbit. He knew that for a little while those long legs of his would keep him from Reddy's sharp teeth, but it would be for only a little while. He had to think and think fast to find some way of escaping from Reddy. Peter is a famous dodger. He was dodging around trees now in a way that made it difficult for Reddy to follow. He couldn't keep this up for long. Peter knew that. All the time he was running and dodging he was thinking fast. Finally he started to cross that clearing. He did it when both Farmer

Brown and Farmer Brown's boy were out of the little house. In fact, Peter ran right between them. He was sure that Reddy Fox would not dare follow him. He was right about that. Reddy dodged back and circled around. "I believe that scamp did that purposely," said Farmer Brown's boy. "I wonder what the rascal will do now. I don't know of any holes or hollow logs that he can get into."

Peter ran past the little house. As he passed the door he saw that it was open just a very little bit. Reddy Fox circled around to try to catch Peter back of the house. Peter saw him in time and turned back. Farmer Brown and Farmer Brown's boy had disappeared among the trees. They were too busy to stop to watch what might happen to Peter. With them out of sight, Reddy was no longer afraid to come out in the open. He ran after Peter. Peter turned the corner of the house and for a moment was out of Reddy's sight. What do you think Peter did then? He pushed that door open just enough for him to get through and went inside that little house. There he crouched in the darkest corner under a bunk.

Reddy came racing around the corner of the house. He stopped short. He looked this way. He looked that way. Where was Peter Rabbit? Mr. Harry Lewis, York, has returned to York, after spending the winter months in U.S.A.
