BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES
(By Thornton W. Burgess)

The foolish only move unknowing Exactly how and where they're going. — Yellow-tail.

they were gardens because the hillsides were so steep. And when he was where he could see that they really were gardens in which fruits and vegetables were growing he wondered how those who planted and hoed took care of them and kept from falling off. He really did. It was these gardens Yellow-tail had on his mind. They had been on his mind for some time. There is a certain thing of which he and Mrs. Yellow-tail, and all the other Orapendulas, are very, very fond and that can be found only in a garden, and not in all gardens; in just a few. That is why Yellow-tail was off by himself looking around. Perhaps he was a little selfish. He was so very fond of what he was looking for that should he find any he would try to keep it a secret to be shared only with Mrs. Yellow-tail. So as he looked over those gardens he was careful to try to keep out of sight, not only of the owners of the gardens but of any others of his own kind who might chance to be in the neighborhood for the same purpose that he was there.

The first garden he visited was a disappointment. He looked it over carefully. He even went over it a second time. There was none of what he was looking for. It was the same way at the next garden he visited, and the next and the next. It was discouraging. Yes, sir, it was discouraging. It wasn't that he didn't find anything at all to eat. He did. He found plenty, for in or near almost every garden were fruit trees of different kinds and Yellow-tail loves fruit. Indeed he is so fond of fruit that he is much disliked by those who plant the fruit and so think it belongs to them.

So Yellow-tail didn't go hungry. No indeed. He nibbled at this and pecked at that and thus spoiled much more than he ate. Many folks are like that. And often those are the very folks who complain most about the high cost of living. Folks are queer that way.

But though Yellow-tail found and sampled several fruits of which he is especially fond he wasn't satisfied. The harder it was to find what he wanted the more he wanted it, and the more determined he was to find it. And that was quite as it should have been. Desire for that which is difficult to get leads to willingness to work, and everywhere in the Great World work is the key to success and attainment. What a pity it is that so many people seem to have lost the key.

Yellow-tail was about ready to give up when he found what he was looking for. It was growing straight and tall, with long narrow leaves, and there wasn't a great deal of it. Yellow-tail visited every plant. It wasn't quite ready to eat but would be soon. Then he hurried back to tell Mrs. Yellow-tail. What do you think it was? It was corn, sweet corn. Yellow-tail is so fond of it that he often is called the Corn Bird.

CONCERNING GRAND SLAMS

Experts are a great deal wrier than average players about bidding grand slams. The expert realizes what the lesser player does not; that even a missing jack, to say nothing about a queen, can cause serious difficulty. That was the case in today's deal, and the declarer had to make an excellent guess for his grand-slam contract.

The bidding:

1 North Pass 2 Pass
3 Pass 4 NT Pass
5 Pass 5 NT Pass
6 Pass 7 Pass

West opened the jack of hearts, and though the dummy was all that South could expect, he saw that a bad suit break in trumps or spades might cause trouble. When he cashed the ace and king of clubs, the 3-1 break of that suit (and specifically, the missing jack) was cause for concern, and immediately following developments were not any more favorable!

Unwilling to run the risk of leaving the club jack in West's hand, declarer drew that card with his queen; then he cashed the spade ace and led the spade six toward dummy in hope that the spade suit would break. When it became apparent that dummy's long suit could not be established because of lack of entries, South really had a difficult decision to make!

It was vital, of course, to avoid the loss of a diamond trick, and there were two methods by which this might be accomplished. One method was to cash the top cards and ruff a third round, hoping that the queen would fall; the other method was to take the diamond finesse. South had observed that East had not let go a single diamond, and though this was by no means conclusive proof that East held the queen, South decided to take the finesse. It was a fortunate decision.
