Old Maid

Spinster Warrants Less Pity Than Many Married Women

Not long ago I attended a wedding at which the youngest of four sisters was being married. The oldest sister was approaching spinsterhood and little murmurs of sympathy for her ran around the room. "Poor Sally, all the girls married but her." "This must be hard on her!" "I feel so sorry for her!" "Such a nice girl and she would make some man such a fine wife. I wonder why she never got a husband." And so on, and so on.

I looked at Sally, handsome, well-groomed, well-dressed, vigorous and vital, alert and wide-awake, gay and smiling. I thought of the good job she held and of her interesting and useful and prosperous life and it seemed to me that she was no object of pity, and that there was no cause for any one to shed tears over her.

Then I looked at her sisters. At Mary, who had married a good enough sort of chap, only he was one of the futile kind who never knew how to get along. No money-maker. Out of a job half the time, and Mary had grown old before her time trying to make ends meet and agonizing over where the rent was to come from and food for the hungry little mouths of her children.

HER HUSBAND DRINKS And I looked at Katie, who had married a handsome youth with a "way" with him with women, who drank too much and who soon tired of her. I thought of the long nights in which she had waited for the return of a drunken footstep; of the jealousy that seared her soul as she pictured him having affairs with other women; of the shame that bowed her head into the dust as she knew herself that most forlorn and hopeless of women—a neglected wife.

And I looked at the bride marrying a boy with no special ability, with only a small salary and no money laid up, letting herself in for a life of poverty and hardships and privations. And I wondered as I looked at the married sisters and at the unmarried one, at the sentimental obsession that makes us still pity the modern old maid. It is easy to understand why the spinster was considered a subject for compassion in the past, when marriage was the only respectable gainful occupation open to women, when they had to hang on to their husbands' coat-tails to get into society, and when whatever pleasure and interest they had in life had to come through the men to whom they were married.

IN those days the old maid had no life of her own whatever. She had to annex herself to some relative who didn't want her. She had no outlet for her energies and her family looked upon her as a failure because she did not succeed in the great feminine objective of inveigling some man to the altar. But the position of the unmarried woman is so changed now that it is hard to understand why we still have this hangover about the desirability of every woman having a husband, no matter what sort of man he is, or what he has to offer her.

And still more curious is the fact that many women feel that way about it themselves. They are not in love. They have a cosmic urge toward matrimony. But they are held by the old tradition that it is a sort of disgrace for a woman to be an old maid and that it marks her as a failure as a woman and shows that she somehow lacked attractions. CAN DO AS SHE PLEASES This in the face of the fact that the unmarried woman every door of opportunity is open and the limit of what she can do is bounded by her own ability. She can have her own home if she chooses. She has her own money that she can spend as she pleases. She doesn't have to put up with a grouchy husband nor stand for the criticism of one man's permission for what she does. And so it is hard to see why being an old maid is regarded as a calamity.

Of course, no one will deny that a happy marriage is the most blessed estate in the world and the nearest we ever get to an earthly paradise. Nor is any woman so fortunate as she who gets a husband who is faithful and true, kind and considerate and tender and sympathetic, and who keeps her safe and sheltered from the storms of life. If every woman who married was sure of getting such a mate, Continued on page 8

That Body Of Yours

EMOTIONS AND CHRONIC ULCERATIVE COLITIS

Many of us are familiar with the story of how the lining of the stomach and the action of the stomach digestive juice on food was attacked by means of an open rupture in the wall of the stomach. We are all more or less familiar with the fact that when an organ is manufacturing a juice there is an increased flow of blood to the lining of the organ and this lining, pale in color, becomes reddish because of this extra flow of blood. An example is the common cold in which the lining of the nose becomes a deeper red because of extra flow of blood.

One of the meanest ailments that affects mankind is what is known as ulcerative colitis, the formation of a heavy mucous and pus in the colon (lower bowel). In the mild form of colitis, mucous colitis, there is an extra flow of water from the lining of the colon, but no pus formation. The mucous colitis is just a persistent diarrhea. For years it has been known that just as emotional disturbances can cause the heart to beat rapidly, perspiration to appear on forehead, hands and feet and other body changes, so can emotional disturbances cause irritation and increased flow of liquid in the colon. Where the emotional disturbances are continuous and due to make-up of the individual, this slight irritation may increase so greatly that it becomes a real inflammation of the lining of the colon, which becomes ulcerated with pus formation.

Just as the stomach wound enabled the investigators to watch the action of the stomach, so opportunities came for examination of the colon of four patients who had undergone operation, leaving the lining of the colon exposed to view. In "The Journal of the American Medical Association," writes Dr. William J. Grace, Stewart Wolf, and Harold G. Wolff, New York, report their observation of the movements or activity of the colon and recorded it by photographs and moving pictures. They found that when patient was calm, the lining of the colon was pale, quiet, slack, with thin mucous secretion on it. During phases of anger and resentment the colon (bowel) was redder, overactive, engorged, covered with thick mucous. Where anger and resentment persisted for some time bleeding and ulceration occurred. The lesson here is that these patients with colitis, mucous or severe, must acquire calmness of spirit, by religion or otherwise, if they wish to avoid operation.

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

"And what will you do, Ellen, when we finally get electricity here?" James smiled as we over our breakfast yesterday morning. And we replied: "Do? Why, when the lights are first turned on — that instant when the dark turns bright, it is likely that the tears will commence. But they'll be glad tears—like those we drop when grand-daughter has been ill or other relative or friend we have been worrying about and has taken a turn for the better. Over the miracle of it, we suppose. And mixed with their tears will be tears for the lamp-light evenings we have had — and proven good."

It's really too bad that to realize how exceedingly pleasant and good a period of time is, we have to look back. There's no telling what lies ahead — only the past and the present, the here-and-now, not even the minute ahead, we know or can be sure about! "Oh, I don't know about that, Ellen," James replied, "the future can be good too—even better than the past. Think of the children growing up. . . Jamie and Gage, grand-daughter and Mackie. They are more interesting every day. Did you know that Mackie crept part way up stairs this morning? He'll soon be coming over along the path with her. The years ahead can be good for us. . . and you know 'We walk by faith' . . . just, by faith."

And so these days tidings of great moment reach the housewives at Alderlea. We see a hopeful sign of a going" at the appearance of strange but very nice craftsmen in the yard. A car halts and a brisk step comes to the veranda. And a man youthful or older says: "Hi—though this initial greeting may be varied. Then a smiling: "This is a nice day!" and a quick survey from head to toe which read means, "Well, this is a different one — and odd! Look at the rig she's got on! Slacks on an old one like her! Oh well, perhaps she's too mean to buy herself a dress. . . or maybe she's a crank and won't give her a cent . . . you can never tell about these country-folks! Or perhaps it takes every cent they make to run this place!" Then briskly and perhaps satisfied that so far looking through the pickets from a chair, curiosity in her pose, could assure a down-payment — and not Continued on page 16

Morning Smile

Funny? A mule and a jeep stopped on the road one day and looked at each other. Mule (breaking silence) — "I'm a horse. What are you?" Jeep — "I'm an automobile." Whereupon they both laughed heartily.

Don't Believe It

When John Jones took his hunting dog out in the fields to show him off to several strangers, to his amazement the dog pointed at one of them. "He's smarter than you think," said the man, "My name is Partridge."

The Stars Say

For Sunday, July 30 It might be advisable to make this a day of relaxation, rest even seclusion, as energies, inner potentials, and forced drives for action could bring forth dramatic reversals. Ungoverned and agitated energies, emotions or impulses could lead to extremes and excesses, not only in thoughts and feelings but also in physical effort or indulgences. Smother all reckless, strenuous and intemperate impulses.

How Can I!!!

Q. How can I get good results when frying pancakes on an aluminum griddle? A. Instead of greasing the griddle rub it with a tablespoon of salt tied in a piece of cotton cloth. Be sure that the griddle is hot and entirely free of grease. Q. How can I remove fat that has formed on the top of soup? A. Put a piece of ice in cheese-cloth, and pass it quickly over the surface of the soup. All fat will adhere to the cloth.

Cook's Corner

MUSHROOM-NUT ROLLS Weekend entertaining coming up? Then these easy-to-make little savories may fit right into your plans. Roll or bake your filled rolls. Yield — two dozen full-sized rolls or four dozen of the tinier ones that are good for dainty serving. 1/4 cup almonds. 1 can condensed cream of mushroom soup. 24 thin slices bread. Blanch the almonds, then chop coarsely and toast until golden, cool. Combine condensed cream of mushroom soup and toasted almonds. Trim crusts from slices of bread; keep bread slices covered with a cloth which has been wrung out of cold water. Spread bread with soup mixture; roll up each slice and secure with a toothpick (if rolls are to be cut in half, for tiny rolls, secure each with two toothpicks).

For the Birthday

Those whose birthday it is may be disposed to plunge headlong and headstrong into turbulent, strenuous and aggressive situations using force and vigor to back up its dynamic urges rather than compromise and common sense. Violent or intemperate tactics, could defeat all aims, provoking antagonism rather than cooperation. In all activities shun excess, extremes and strife, as reactions may prove dangerous. A child born on this day may be naturally endowed with keen energies, inflammatory urges, and uncontrollable impulses. These must be disciplined and channeled into constructive expression or they could create havoc and lasting harm.

For the Birthday

Those whose birthday it is might find it profitable to take time for relaxation and recuperation before going to the front, with important new ideas, plans or propositions. These seem to be incubating and could gain by some measure of quiet study, behind-scenes planning or building up along creative lines, before attacking concrete and tangible sources for financial business promotion. Be prepared for the best. A child born on this day is aspirational, ambitious and capable of support from higher-ups. It would gain by heeding its inner urgings, ideals or intuitive leads.

Rubber bands, doubled and fastened around the ends of coat hangers, will also prevent garments from slipping off. Marrying Mark

By VIOLETTE KIMBALL DUNN Continued "Oh, yes!" breathed Valerie. Did she adore them! Or at least, would she if she ever had the chance! "Hurry up and get yourself two or three more years and I'll make a driver of you." He would have promised to let her run the solar system for the joy that leaped into her face. She didn't say anything. Just sat and looked at him. "I'll teach you anyhow," he decided. "The woods are full of swelled back roads. They won't let you out where people can see you, but what difference does that make?" She sild suddenly against him. Looking down past the blue beret and the rim of copper colored curls, he could see her lashes heavy with tears. This would never do. He switched suddenly to clothes. "By the way," he wanted to know. "What are lovely young women wearing this season? Your aunt seemed to think you ought to have a new deal in frocks. And anything else—"
