STORIES OF DENVER.

TOLD BY ONE WHO WAS A BOY WHEN THAT CITY WAS YOUNG.

How a Soldier Taught the Youth a Lesson in Discretion—The Miner Who Lost His All in the Gambling House—His Trick With a Few Grains of Powder.

Emory N. Yard, recently mayor of Trenton and one of its most respected citizens, has many reminiscences of the early days in Denver, where he passed part of his boyhood.

"I was about 16 years old," he said, "when I entered the general merchandise store of my uncle, the building being on one of the principal streets. My relative remarked to me one day that it probably would fall to my lot to see some things now and then that it would be well I should not see. The wisdom of this advice was impressed upon me some weeks later when a soldier came into the store to buy some tobacco. I placed several pieces before him, noting at the same time that he was a rough looking fellow. My uncle was away and I was alone. While the customer was handling the different pieces I saw him slip two of them into his pocket. He fumbled the others for some minutes and then said he would not buy any that day, but would call again.

"Before you go," said I, "I want you to pay for those two pieces you put in your pocket."
 "Do you accuse me of stealing your tobacco?" he angrily asked.
 "I was young and impulsive and answered:
 "That's what I'm saying. You've stolen two pieces and must pay for them or hand them back," and to give emphasis to my words I suggestively closed my fingers around a two pound weight.

"Well, I don't think there was a square inch of floor in that store over which that soldier failed to drag me, and I believe he hammered down every nail with my head, after which he walked off with the tobacco.

"When my uncle returned, I told him my story and insisted that he should bring the soldier to punishment. The old man surveyed my battered countenance and then remarked:
 "Emory, you don't look quite so pretty as you did yesterday, but I think you know a little more," and that was the end of it. I comprehended then that it would have been wiser for me not to have seen the pilfering of the tobacco.

"In those days fortunes were won and lost in a few hours, and sometimes fierce encounters took place. Men would toil for months to scrape a little gold together and then come down to Denver and lose it all in a single night. One afternoon a miserable looking fellow drifted into town. His buckskin suit was ragged, his shoes tied to his feet with strings, his hair long and straggling and his beard untrimmed for months. This man had been absent for two years. He had been in the mountains, where he had toiled half starved, fought wild animals and still wilder red men and finally succeeded in getting together about $600 worth of gold dust. He sauntered into the gaming place, sat down at one of the tables and when he arose, less than an hour later, had lost every cent he had.

"His misfortune seemed to daze him. He wandered aimlessly around the room for a few minutes and then without a word passed out into the storm and darkness. No one noticed or cared for him. The next morning the vagrant sauntered into the place again. He was the picture of woe and wretchedness, but said nothing. During the day few were present, and he sat still most of the time sighing, but remaining speechless. When night came and the men began gathering, he eagerly watched the play, in which he could take no part.

"This pantomime continued for several days, until the attendant, who was always present, grew furious. He urged the man to brace up, to go back to the mountains, get more gold and try his luck again, which was sure to improve, but the stranger shook his head, muttered to himself and gave the impression that his brain was turned over his loss. The room in which the gaming was done was long and narrow, the tables being placed along the sides. When it began to grow dark, the attendant was accustomed to light up and arrange the little pyramids of gold on each table, ready for the players, who soon appeared. Near the middle of the room was a large, old fashioned stove.

"Early one crisp evening, as the attendant began lighting the place and arranging the gold coin, the woe-begone stranger shuffled through the open door. Without speaking, he walked to the stove, reached his thumb and forefinger under his arm, took out a pinch of black grains and flung them into the front of the stove. A flash and puff instantly followed. He repeated the act and was about to do it again, when the attendant who was watching him demanded:
 "What are you doing there?"
 "The man snatched out a large bladder from under his ragged coat. It was capable of holding several pounds of powder, and it was from this bag that the visitor had taken the grains that flashed and exploded when flung among the coals through the little opening in the door.
 "I've lost everything, and we may as well go to hell together," he answered, and as he did so he opened the door of the stove and jammed the bag and its contents inside.
 "The terrified attendant emitted one yell and was out of the front door at a single bound. Hatless and coatless, he dashed down the street for several blocks before he dared slacken his pace. Then he paused to listen to the explosion and to see the establishment sail skyward, but everything remained as it was, and no unusual sound broke upon his ear. He stole timidly back and peeped through the door. Nothing, as far as he could see, was disturbed. Growing suspicious, he walked to the stove and examined the bag and its contents. The contents looked like grains of gunpowder, but he quickly discovered that they were only black sand, the few pinches which the man first exploded having been the only powder in his possession.
 "Then the attendant made a further examination. The frowsy vagrant was nowhere in sight. Every dollar of gold that had been placed on the tables had vanished, and neither they nor the stranger ever appeared in Denver again."—New York Sun.

One reason why Scott's Emulsion cures weak throats, weak lungs, makes rich blood, and strengthens puny and delicate children is because all its parts are mixed in so scientific a manner that the feeblest digestion can deal with it. This experience has only come by doing one thing for nearly 25 years.

This means, purest ingredients, most evenly and delicately mixed, best adapted for those whose strength has failed or whose digestion would repel an uneven product.
