Opening lead—four of spades. The greatest stumbling block to improvement, once a player has had sufficient experience, is the tendency to play mechanically.

Situations of a similar nature, whether in bidding or play, tend to repeat themselves, and the player who is inclined to play automatically and without thought, because he feels he has previously encountered the same situation, many times finds later he has erred.

To illustrate our point, we present the circumstances faced by East in the defense of the three notrump contract. We make no claim his proper defense is easy to discover. On the contrary, we would say it was most difficult. However, the reader can judge for himself what East should do at the critical point.

Declarer played the king of spades from dummy, East took the ace, and cashed the queen. The question is what East should now return. Remember he sees only his own hand and dummy's. The proper play is the king of hearts! Looking at all four hands it becomes easy to see this is the only card in East's hand he can play which defeats the contract. A low heart back at trick three will not do the job, nor will a club return. It must be specifically the king of hearts.

What is the reasoning East uses to find this defense? He sees that declarer will surely make nine tricks if South has all the missing high cards. To defeat the contract, therefore, it is required that West have an entry in the form of the ace of clubs or the queen of hearts.

If West has the ace of clubs, declarer cannot possibly run nine tricks even though the king of hearts lead benefits him. The club lead at this point cannot be vital. But if West has the queen of hearts, that entry must be established before declarer sets up his diamonds. Hence the thoughtful lead of the king of hearts.

Wooing Arab Goodwill Has Not Paid For United States

By JOHN HIGHTOWER
WASHINGTON (AP) — When President Eisenhower took over direction of U.S. foreign affairs five years ago he pledged himself to work out a policy that would be clear, consistent and coherent. He is still trying to fulfill that pledge.

The issues have been complicated by Russia's striking gains in the new weapons of the space age. Yet basically today's problems are the same as during the first years of what Secretary of State Dulles once called the Eisenhower era in world affairs.

The most noteworthy difference lies in the widespread doubt among allies and neutrals alike as to whether Eisenhower and Dulles are still capable of effective leadership.

Eisenhower has proclaimed platitudes as policy on so many occasions that allies and friends who would still like to follow his lead seriously question whether in fact he is really moving forward at all.

At the close of their fifth year of running foreign affairs, Eisenhower and Dulles face probably their greatest challenge. It is to reassert United States military-scientific supremacy, rally allied confidence in U.S. leadership and persuade Congress to vote foreign aid funds and atomic secrecy relaxation.

NOT ALWAYS CLEAR
The Eisenhower - Dulles handling of foreign affairs has not always appeared to follow a clear policy in the judgment of its critics. For example, the Republican administration came into power after routinely denouncing the prior Democratic administration for yielding ground to communism in spite of the fact that it fought the Communists to save South Korea.

The new president and his secretary of state found, however, that their policy of "massive retaliation" — with local variations — to protect remote areas from Communist conquest was not sufficient to save all Indochina. In the Asian peace conference of 1954, the West gave up northern Viet Nam in order to save the southern territory and end the Indochinese war. More significant has been the inability of the United States to keep Communist power out of the Middle East. The record is that a series of misadventures between Dulles and Egyptian President Nasser resulted in the sale of arms to Egypt by Russia. With that opening, Russia also sold arms to Syria.

That the Eisenhower - Dulles Middle East policy should have wound up in an Egyptian-Syrian blind alley is ironical. One of Dulles' first actions as secretary of state was to visit the Middle East, soft-pedal U.S. support for Israel and woo Arab goodwill, especially in Egypt.

OTHER TWISTS
But the record also has other ironical twists. Dulles denounced the Truman administration policy of containment toward Russia and talked a great deal about liberation of satellite peoples from Soviet rule. But when Hungarian patriots made their all-out bid to cast off the Communist yoke, the United States met the crisis with a decision not to risk a military conflict through intervention and issued statements denouncing Soviet brutality.

In the same general category, Eisenhower and Dulles climaxed years of Republican denunciation of the loss of China to the Communists by unleashing Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to strike out from his Formosan stronghold against the Red mainland. That was in February, 1953.

It was not many months before Chiang was "re-leashed." Eisenhower had decided that he could not afford to let the avowed Chinese Nationalists involve the United States in war with Red China.

The most difficult task of statesmanship that has burdened Eisenhower and Dulles has been that of trying to hold together a loose military alliance against the Soviet Union while simultaneously holding the door open to negotiations for a settlement with Russia.

BIG FOUR SUMMIT
The high point of co-operation with Russia came at the Big Four summit session at Geneva in mid-1955. Dulles had resisted such a meeting, Eisenhower had long been intrigued by the prospect of meeting Russia's post-Stalin leaders. But it was an urgent demand by Prime Minister Eden that tipped the scales finally in favor of a conference. The Geneva conference produced no diplomatic settlements. It created the impression that Russia and the United States had finally convinced each other that neither wanted an atomic war. That heady hopefulness was largely destroyed in the Hungarian crisis of November, 1956.

Meanwhile the U.S. split with Britain and France over their attack on Egypt had in turn split the Atlantic alliance. Thus began a series of meetings among allied leaders that culminated in December's summit session of all the NATO heads of government.

Even that particular way of trying to demonstrate Western solidarity did not win approval until the Western powers, and especially the United States, received the most parring blow of all.

It was Russia's successful launching of an earth satellite months ahead of the United States. Scientifically, it put the Soviet Union far out ahead. Militarily and diplomatically, it meant that the lead of the West-
