If a woman has sinned in her youth, and if she has done her best to atone should she allow that early mis-step to ruin her life? To Margaret Hill as she stood clasped in the embrace of the man she loved, that question was like a knife turning in her heart. John Dredford was willing, may eager to accept her as she was—the beautiful woman whose glorious voice had charmed all Europe. But she knew that the deed had not been buried in the world's oblivion, and that she would face her with the dreaded question. WHAT DID SHE DO?
