ARV HAWORTH

Man Remarries Thinking That He Has Legal Divorce

Dear Mary Haworth: My husband and I were married three years ago in a civil ceremony performed by the town mayor. We had known each other for 25 years but our paths had parted until four years ago.

My husband had been married before but was divorced, he said, because he had signed papers sent by his wife, and returned them to her years ago (when he was living out- of -state).

We separated last April and I learned by checking that he and his first wife were never divorced. To say I was shocked is an understatement.

I telephoned her to ask about it. She was very alarmed, as she is living with a man, bears his name and has adopted children. She told me she started the divorce but didn't go through with it for lack of money. She said she has been quite surprised to read of our marriage. Why didn't she stop it?

We all live in the same town and I can't imagine my husband going through a civil ceremony before the whole community if he didn't think he was legally free. I have my divorce papers.

Who is the bigamist in this case— my husband, his first wife or me? What kind of mess am I in? What should I do? Please help me understand.— C.N.

Dear C.N.: You were more sinned against than sinning, it seems. You were the innocent victim of an embarrassing legal boner, but never a bigamist, as I get the picture.

As for the man's culpability (if any), I think a court would hardly construe him to be a bigamist, guilty of wilful intent to evade the law, inasmuch as he believed sincerely (didn't he?) that his former wife had divorced him long ago.

Her present status as another man's helpmate without benefit of law or clergy, and without being divorced from her former husband, is a mess, to use your term. But it isn't bigamous per se. It may have other connotations, offensive to the law in that jurisdiction, but that's not your problem.

For peace of mind, get a legal adviser's confidential assessment of your entanglement, and what, if anything, needs doing to clear your record. The nearest Legal Aid Bureau or Family Service counselling staff can process the question for you.— M.H.

Dear Mary Haworth: You cut them to pieces but they keep on writing. Why? Are you an old maid with twisted ideas and a mixed-up mind, that no fine man with any sense would ever look at twice? Perhaps you have been jilted, being too harsh and self-centered to give any male a chance to really know you.

Take the case of F.Y., the 37-year-old career woman, in love with a married co-worker, expecting his child. His wife is a paralytic, whom he won't divorce. F.Y. asks is happiness possible in a common - law companionship; and is it fair to the child? You say there is no happiness for her in a "back street affair."

Where is her own common sense? At her age, she can't afford to pass up anything. If she listens to you, there will be just one more old maid in the world.— T.S.

Dear Mary Haworth: How very wrong is your judgment, I think, in regard to F.Y., who hopes to keep her expected baby and have half-a-loaf of happiness with the man she loves, who cannot divorce his invalid wife.

You say the unborn child's long-term welfare may be better served by giving him (or her) for adoption. My advice is: never, never tell any mother to give her baby for adoption. A child is God's gift to womankind; there is no love like it.

Encourage F.Y. to take what happiness she can get. There is always a chance that marriage might eventuate later. I always read and general approve your views; but this once I think you are all wrong.— A.G.

St. Paul's WA Holds Meeting

Mrs. Geo. G. Wood, president of the P.E.I. diocesan board, was the guest speaker of branch "B" WA of St. Paul's Church, Charlottetown, on Tuesday afternoon. She related the highlights from Mrs. Nylander's address as given at the dominion annual meeting held in Montreal. Mrs. Nylander is the wife of the high commissioner of Ghana, and stressed the importance of Christianity in her own country.

To them, she said Sunday is a day of complete rest and worship. They are not in favor of homes for our senior citizens as they believe it is a high honour to have their older folk in their own homes.

Mrs. Wood gave a vivid description of Mrs. Nylander's charming personality and distinctive native costume.

Mrs. Noel DeBlois, the president, thanked Mrs. Wood for her interesting account of Mrs. Nylander's address. Mrs. O.S. Harper, second vice-president, led in the scripture read. ing and prayers. Mrs. John B. Murley, secretary, reported on last month's meeting. Mrs. W. E. Massey, treasurer, stated amount on hand and the several amounts received and disbursed during the month. Mrs. S.W. Logan reported on a meeting of the Protestant Social Welfare and stated the need of children's clothing and especially the need of layettes.

Branch "B" decided to provide one layette for this worthwhile organization. Other reports were postponed until the next meeting.

Mrs. George DeBlois and Mrs. John Murley volunteered to prepare the Wednesday morning Communion. Mrs. A. J. Haslam and Mrs. J.A. Likely were appointed a nominating committee for the annual meeting next month.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Brook's Troubled Waters Are No Soothing Lullaby

It is no soothing lullaby that comes up to us from the water falling through the spillways in the dam, tonight. It is a troubled sound: that of the stream in freshet-flow. Today we watched feeder streamlets, from the showers, coursing, saw too the roiled increased flow. Watched it fall at the gates into the swirling pools beneath, and rush away madly to join the river below.

And thought of the serene days of younger autumns, of gentle November days, still and quietly beautiful, when in sunshine and blue skies the day was a flashback from summer. to give us lovely memories of this month when, sooner or later, Winter should knock on our doors.

We think of them now, those windless and peaceful days, in which one found some excuse to be out about: maybe tending the fowls, with a pair of little lads of the place, who someow, as do all such small ones, seemed to grow up too soon. So we would clean and tidy the nests and floor, in the poultry-house, bringing thither then, baskets of chaff and armfuls of straw from the barn. And maybe, one of the fine, rustling sheaves, James had saved on our account from the threshing, to provide choice litter for the birds.

How well they enjoyed it! No balanced ration of nowadays could ever inspire the pure delight with which fowls welcomed a sheaf! Satisfaction, content, was clearly written in their actions, and in their voices as they scratched and sang, and selected, and gleaned their grains.

And all the time we would be aware of the healthy pulse of the grinding at the mill below. A team would be drawn up at the open half-door, while others awaited their turn. Some were laden with grists. Others with empty carts, or wagons, or perhaps an express-wagon, waited to pick up the flour, the shorts, the middlings, and the bran, or maybe the jute sacks of the crushing, before this, left there.

And if James were at home, and not gone to do a bit of late plowing — maybe breaking first furrows tollsomely on a patch of virgin soil, but at some chore of season about, he would come to stand in the yard, and shading eyes against the westering sun look down on the scene below. He could note at a glance a strange horse, because, like a youngster born to these times, who can easily recognize machines at a distance, he knew all the horses in the countryside for miles around.

"That's...from the South Shore" he would say. "That's a great man with horses! You never see him with a poor one. A nice animal that. A young one, I would say — likely from that mare I've seen him drive. Yes, now a lot like her too... He has a long trip ahead of him. He won't make it before dark. I'm thinking."

Or, and we have been tickled over this one:

"There, Ellen, is the new horse...bought! Not a bad looking animal neither, is it? Got him up...way. I believe" he would say with a shy smile, not unlike that which breaks over Mack's features when something is about to coax him away, "I'll slip down a minute and have a look at him. If he's as good as he looks from here, I'd say, he has made good buy."

We "had a look at" the rain today, and the streamlets coursing, and the troubled waters of the millstream.

But now, gratefully, we find a star above a hill.

Until tomorrow — — Diary—
