Outpost in China

By Val Gielgas

Continued

"It's too easy," she said, "to throw the responsibility of any decision on me. How can I leave you to stay here and get into a mess all alone?"

"Oh don't worry about that," sneered Gerald. "You'll be such a help in this sort of mood."

"Very well. I'll never ask you to do anything for me again. You shall preserve your precious vanity. But don't blame me if things go wrong."

"They won't go wrong," said Gerald violently.

To that the girl made no reply. He went to her and put a hand on her shoulder.

"I'm sorry, Sheila. I don't want to hurt your feelings. But you don't understand how a man feels about his job of work."

Sheila jumped up and moved away from him.

"Please Gerald. That sort of he-mannery doesn't prove anything, you know, and it leaves me cold."

At that he winced as if she had struck him.

"I suppose," he muttered, "I had better be getting down to the office—"

"Is it worth while as late as this?" asked Sheila coldly.

"Can't you leave me alone?"

"I was only wondering," she went on, "just what I was going to do with myself all day."

"Dale's still here," said Gerald. "Better make the most of his brilliant society while you've still got it."

He picked up his hat and whip and went to the french window.

There for a moment he waited, hoping for some sign from the girl that after all she would make up to the quarrel. After all it was so silly—

He shrugged irritably, went out on the veranda and down the steps to where his pony was waiting, switching his tail at the pestering flies.

CHAPTER IX

GENERAL WU PAYS A CALL

Just about the moment when Gerald Havelock mounted his pony to ride down into Tan Fu, another mounted personage clattered along the little town's muddy, twisted and roughly cobbled streets. But this was a very different figure from the trim, almost dandified Gerald. This was a Chinaman. But he looked more like one of the riders of Genghis or of Tamerlane, than a Celestial. His face darkly burned and cruelly scarred on one side, was twisted in a sneer that was half contempt for the scared coolies who watched him; half fear of the reputation of Leslie Dale. He wore boots of untanned leather tucked into khaki breeches obtained heaven knew where, an exiguous and dirty shirt—crossed by band dollers bulging with cartridges, and a Mannlicher rifle across his shoulders. A pseudo-ossack fur hat completed his costume.

A small crowd gathered at his pony's heels to follow his progress to the Harwood and Great office, where he dismounted with an engaging swagger; but fell back, jabbering and pointing uneasily, when the bandit—for bandit of course he was, from "General" Wu's lair in the hills—whipped a long knife out of his belt and strode into the office.

Four minutes later he emerged, but without the knife, swung himself on to his pony's back, kicked it brutally in its thin ribs, and clattered away and out of the town, leaving behind him what for once a newspaper could have referred to, without appreciable inaccuracy, as "sensation."

It was perhaps well that he was out of sight before Gerald Havelock arrived at his office. Gerald, fresh from his row with Sheila, was in no amiable mood, and had he met the Bandit, it is more than likely that sensation might have been followed by Alarming Incidents.

As it was, Gerald was merely rendered rather curious by the unexpected cluster of Chinese outside his office. He went in quickly. His clerks were working in a most unusual and absolute silence. He flung open the door of the Private Office, and gasped. "What the devil—?" he demanded.

His comrador was sitting motionless in Gerald's chair. His skin was unhealthy green from sheer funk. His eyes were bulging unpleasantly, partly perhaps owing to the foul taste of the greasy rag which had been stuffed into his mouth and tied behind his head. On Leslie Dale's blotter lay a grimy sheet of paper, covered with Chinese characters, pinned to the blotter with a long glittering dagger.

CHAPTER X

TURNING POINT OF HER LIFE

For some minutes after her husband had left her Sheila Havelock sat, continued the polishing of her pretty nails and reflected.

Nova Scotia Woman Dares to Tell Her Story

Mrs. M. H. Bell, Liverpool, N.S., dared by friends to tell her story, said: "I suffered with arthritic pain in my shoulder, arms and ankles for three years, but it wasn't until I took Sarnak that I got relief."

If you suffer from rheumatic, neuritic, or arthritic pain, sciatica or backache or from some stomach, kidney or liver disorders, nutritional anemia and nervousness, try Sarnak for one week. Prove that Sarnak can help you. $1.35 at all drug stores.

Sheila had many of the more firesome affectations of the modern young woman but she also possessed the supreme among the modern young woman's virtues: she was honest with herself. And she knew, with a queer feeling of excitement and apprehension, that for the first time she was facing a crisis and a turning-point in her life. She could honestly say that she had within her limitations—done her best to cope with Tan Fu, for Gerald's sake. It was Gerald who had failed, as the Americans say, to "make the grade." And just as Gerald had gradually revealed himself as a weakling and an incompetent, so Leslie Dale had forced himself into a limelight entirely undesired, as the most efficient of guides, philosophers and friends.

With him at hand to cover up mistakes, to take over responsibilities, Tan Fu had been bad enough. Without him
