MARY HAWORTH Impaired Hearing Often Causes Social Problems

Dear Mary Haworth: Some body wrote you recently about a sense unattractive man of 30, who is a social misfit. I think it is a pity (Otherwise he is a swell fellow, a good worker and a good citizen. I know from experience the psychological effects on personality of a hearing handicap.

In my mind, there is no one who is a social misfit. I think a definite hearing loss, without a hearing aid, is a handicap. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to communicate with others. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to understand what others are saying. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to participate in social activities.

His tenseness in social gatherings and public places is due to his inability to understand what others are saying. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to communicate with others. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to understand what others are saying. It is a handicap because it is a handicap to the person's ability to participate in social activities.

A Fashion Item At HOLMAN'S

Dear Mary Haworth: I am a teenage girl, a junior in high school. I met Tom last fall. He had been dating my best friend until she moved away (they never really broke up).

Then he and I started dating and were very happy together. She came back for a visit at Christmas and had two or three dates with him while here (he and I had agreed in advance that this would be okay).

Before she left, however, she asked him to steady with her, even though she lives miles away. He consented; and after that and I didn't date. He still comes to see me occasionally, just to talk, as if I were his good friend.

I never want to lose his friendship so the really is a wonderful guy. I still like him a awful lot. I know his crazy and was to see him this Christmas, but he has to date him again, without ruining our friendship (his and mine).

Dear C.V.: Evidently Sue had dated Tom in the past. In returning his ring, presumably she annulled their Christmas pledge to go steady. Likely she is a found somebody closer home to fill his shoes.

So maybe Tom is in the mood to resume dating you, but lacks the nerve to try to promote it, after giving you the gate last winter, on the basis of his second whirl with Sue. Possibly he assumes you wouldn't run that risk again, for which he wouldn't blame you.

A diplomatic approach to a friendship, is to give a teenage party, of a size you can manage—three, four or more couples—and ask Tom to help you in the planning of a backyard cookout or a buffet supper with dancing to records. This is your opportunity to be Tom's girl again.

Dear Mary Haworth: Three women friends went to a showing of stereoscopic views. Each had her own way of looking at them. After the first intermission, due to a shuffle of movable chairs, I sat next to a man of about 45. (I am 65). We talked off and on to the end of the show. They rejoined my friends for refreshments. One woman assailed me on
