ELLEN'S DIARY

Lilac-scent Now Overlays June-field And Woodland

"The lilac scent— you can smell it now above all else! Have you noticed?" Mack said, inhaling deeply the fragrance this morning, while the dew still lay about.

How delightful it was, overlaying the perfume of apple blossom, of June- field, and woodland, and returning scenes of former lilac-times to us..... Among them, we pictured a bouquet of lilac blooms on the Master's desk when last weeks of the school-year were fast spending away, and the noonhours and recesses for the senior class, of which we were a member, were enjoyable periods spent chatting in the shade of a remembered spruce tree near the schoolyard... Just beyond us the Post Road carried the passing conveyances. And over the fields was the shimmer and sheen of the Strait. And the wind was a zephyr come up from the shore, wafting a hundred young fancies to the minds of the students. These, if all went well with us, would be the last of our schooldays, and though more or less excited at the thought of this, we recall now the note of regret which attended our chatting. Gospel, we spoke, in our young opinions, and made enchanting prophesies of what adventures might lie for us in the years that were ahead. And with the odd exception, the chipmunk that chir-rred overhead, screened by the thick branches, protesting our laughter and chatter could have made a forecast as true! But those were good days, young and sun-filled, though, in a manner, they were leading up to the parting of our ways.

There was peace in that world we knew. Britain was our Motherland. She was mistress of the seas. We could play, and study, and chat, and sleep well. No thought of war intruded. There was no sign on our sky that the lone lad of the class was one day to hear that pibroch sounding, which was calling youths to battle-lines.

Lilacs... on a Master's desk. Do the young fry, we wonder, bring in bouquets of this scented bloom these days to a schoolroom, to make lasting memories for themselves in years to come?

"Better take your fill of them, Ellen" James smiled, when a while ago we listened from a verandah to the pond- folks' tune. "Their music will soon be past."

So lovely the night is— with its stars over the dewy fields that reach away in the dimness. Silent and peaceful it is. No wind. No sound then of animal or machine. Only the music and the echo of the traffic out on the Highway, which comes in to us like the sound of waves' beat on the sands of the shore.

"A perfect night" James commented. "It's as June- nights should be."

The goldfinches were carrying bits of wool today.

"Why... and where?" Peter questioned.

"It's a secret" Alex smiled. "But" he added "some day we'll know!"

And this was a choice one indeed of June's sun-blest days.

Until tomorrow — Diary — good-night.....
