Canadian Garden Service 1951

By Gordon Lindsay Smith

Equipment

In comparison with most other hobbies or recreations, equipment for gardening does not present much of a problem. Minimum requirements will be a rake, a spade, some sort of tool for cultivating, and possibly a cheap duster or sprayer. For the lawn, of course, a mower of some kind will be necessary.

From those minimum requirements one can go as far as pursue and inclination will dictate. Much will depend upon the size of the lot. For the average city layout not a great deal more will be necessary under any circumstances. But many of the newer homes today have far larger lots than a few years ago. Half an acre or more is not uncommon.

Power Tools

Where this is the case money will be well spent on additional specialized equipment, such as power lawn-mowers, possibly a garden tractor, two or three cultivators of different sizes, a wheel barrow, etc. These tools or machines will take a good deal of drudgery out of the business and permit one man to look after a considerable area in his spare time. With a small tractor, for instance, one can cultivate a half acre vegetable plot in an hour or so, though of course there will be some close or hand work left. And there are other jobs that these machines will handle with some of the various attachments available. They will drive the regular lawn-mowers and with a special mowing bar will cut big weeds or long grass, and they can be rigged up to light carts.

Cultivation

A few years ago much was heard about shallow cultivation. Some enthusiasts even advised against deep plowing or spading. In certain dry areas and on a big scale that maybe advisable, but for the average garden the simplest way of preparing the soil for spring is to plow or spade. That can be done first thing in the spring or in late fall. This buries grass, sod, weeds and fresh manure, all of which will break down into humus and other plant food. Then plowing or spading will also kill a good many weed seeds and wintering insects and disease germs.

After this only light cultivation later.

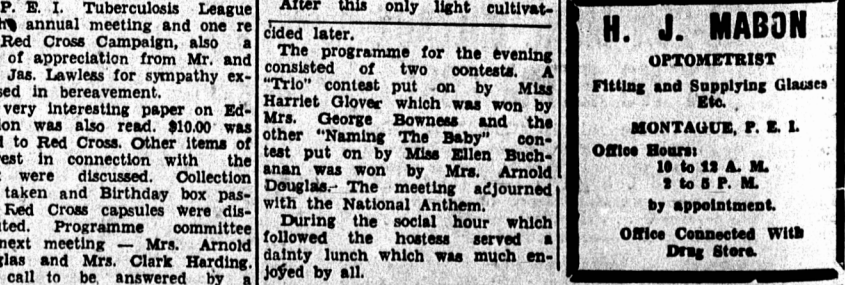

The programme for the evening consisted of two contests. A "Trio" contest put on by Miss Harriet Glover which was won by Mrs. George Bowness and the other "Naming The Baby" contest put on by Miss Ellen Buchanan was won by Mrs. Arnold Douglas. The meeting adjourned with the National Anthem.

During the social hour which followed the hostess served a dainty lunch which was much enjoyed by all.
