ELLEN'S DIARY

Lookout Bedroom Cool And Shadowed At Dawn

"The wedding" James observed this morning at breakfast, after a moment of silence. "Yes, we'll have to get to that as soon as the mangoes are ready - soon as the mangoes are ready," said James, "I don't know when they'll be ready, but I'll need all the help we can muster. We manage a chuckle, though we confess to owning some regret over our inexperience at this chore, which we had to do. James added to a visiting farmer who tells proudly that "the wife can beat me at a contest of row of mangoes or turnip" that "that is something, Ellen can't do that" "Who you go to get a wife" we have heard James advise lads of lead at weddings of years ago, when we came to the field to call them to dinner "be sure you get one, who knows how to handle a hoe." "But I thought you picked 'em out because you loved 'em" a warty one laughed. "You'll love them, that's for sure. If at a time like this" James grinned "they're rowing you row for row at the wedding!" Cleaning stalls and sheds at those bars over the fields when the overflow of cattle wintered - there where the sheep too sheltered, and the goats, that strangely enough this year gave us no cute increase. James, the younger farmer and Mack worked today. They spread the cleanings on a pasture that runs there to make the white clovers grow. We followed them to the clearing and welcomed Scamie's pleased bark, which, at first sight of the little truck, approached, he barked home to their meals. We followed too. In thought this afternoon, the mango lads and their mother who went up the slope from the house across the lane to gather wild strawberries in a quiet glade there - A clear field this was when in our young years at the farm with James, we took a like pair thistles an old meadow where the nibby fruit grew. Now the grasses it, and leaflessly, with an interesting mixture of trees. But still along the old lane, in the other sunny nooks, the strawberries grow. Stained cheeks,

MARY HAWORTH

This Spoiled Sally Spurns Family To Get Married

Dear Mary Haworth: My niece Sally, very pretty but very immature, recently left home, rejecting her entire family, including her mother, to get married. Her prospective in-laws are harboring her in their home until the wedding, which is set for September. We think she must be led to them about her own life; else what kind of people are they? Sally is a spoiled child; after a couple of bouts with rheumatic fever. When she wants something, she gets it until she gets her way. At 15, at 16 and again at 17 years of age, she set her will against her parents, in the matter of dating boys too seriously. More than two years ago she met Dave, who then had four years of college work ahead. They dated steadily, against the wishes of both families. Sally left home during one of her sulks, when tears and silence did not move the family. She was gone a week, then came back enraged. A short while ago Sally barged in to say that she and Dave's parents had arranged and planned her wedding, that her parents would be invited and would they please send a list of relatives to Dave's mother. Sally's mother refuses to be a "guest" at her daughter's pre-planned wedding. Are we, the family - in aunts, uncles, cousins - right in joining our relatives in not attending the wedding? That is, if we are invited, which is doubtful. Sally has "use" only for people who can do things for her, who are in-laws, at this writing, after the wedding, Sally directed to suit, turned on the tears, then left home, taking all her belongings with her. Please, G.G. Dear G.G: On second thought it is a loss to my mind whether this is fact or fiction. There is that about the plot, the cast of characters, the typescript that bears an elusive resemblance to the output of a mad scientist. The mad scientist of the woods, who has been sending me elaborately detailed story material every week for a dozen years or so. Always signing a different name and address, and every week, I have a remedy for the frustrations portrayed. I have had a shade of difference here; so I'll answer literally.
