BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

SALLY SLY SNOOPS AGAIN
There is nothing worse than snooping Than to be a sneak and snooping.—Old Mother Nature.

Sally Sly was through with laying eggs, but she wasn't through with snooping. She is a born snooper. Nobody like snoopers, but Sally Sly the Cowbird doesn't care about that. She snoops just the same.

First she had been snooping to find nests of other folks in which she could leave her eggs for them to hatch. Now she was snooping for another purpose altogether. While Sally Sly is too selfish to be a mother, or else too lazy, she does sometimes keep watch of her children who are being mothered by other folks. Perhaps it is just curiosity. Perhaps she just wants to know how many of her eggs have hatched and what kind of care her babies are getting. Of course she remembered every nest in which she had laid an egg. So now she was snooping around to get a chance to peep into each of those nests to see how her babies were faring.

"Where is my baby?" demanded Sally Sly.

She knew that the egg she had left in Welcome Robin's nest had been thrown out. She found that one other egg had been thrown out of another nest. But in the nest of Redeye the Vireo she found one baby bigger than any of the others and knew it was her own. She found the same in the nest of Little Friend the Song Sparrow. There were two other nests in which she found babies of her own. Last of all she watched for a chance to peep into the nest of Mr. and Mrs. Sunshine, the Yellow Warblers. That was one nest she had been sure and when there were several babies doing that Father and Mother almost wore their wings off hunting for worms and insects. There were four babies in that nest and Mr. and Mrs. Sunshine were going and coming from daylight to dark.

When Sally Sly first saw that nest, she blinked once or twice. "It seemed to me that that nest is extra high," said she. "I don't remember that I looked that way when I set my egg there."

From her hiding place she watched Sunshine drop a small worm into a wide open little mouth. Then he flew away in search of another. Mrs. Sunshine arrived with another small worm and dropped it into another wide open small mouth. Then she flew away. This was Sally Sly's chance. She flew over where she could look down into that nest. Some thing was wrong. Anyway, she thought something was wrong. There were four babies in that nest and they were all of a size. Yes, sir, they were all of one size. That meant just one thing. It meant that they were four baby Warblers. Where was her baby?

She was so puzzled, because she had been sure that there would be one of her babies in that nest. That she forgot to keep out of sight. Mrs. Sunshine returned with another worm.

"Where is my baby?" demanded Sally Sly.

Mrs. Sunshine dropped the worm into a wide open little mouth. Then she looked at Sally Sly.

"Have you a baby?" she asked.

"What happened to the egg that I left in your nest?" demanded Sally Sly.

"Oh," said Mrs. Sunshine. "Was that your egg that I found in my nest? We didn't want it."

"But what did you do with it?" demanded Sally Sly.

Mrs. Sunshine said nothing but flew away in search of another worm. and to this day Sally Sly doesn't know that little Warbler simply built another story to the nest over the egg she didn't want.
