

Our Boys at Sussex. REVIEW, SHAM FIGHT, &c.

On the evening of the 30th, when the day's work was over, many of the men and officers went to

THE VILLAGE OF SUSSEX to see and be seen. Large numbers of men from the other regiments went also; and there was quite a stream of red uniforms, mixed with the dark blue of the artillery and the showy ones of the hussars, on the road to the village. There is nothing remarkable about the village itself, but the fields and trees have a style of their own, different from what we are accustomed to see on the island. Although not very far off, the village was quite hidden by the heavy foliage of a few elm trees that were scattered here and there between it and the camp. It lies beside a brook about forty feet wide, which winds down Sussex Valley, and to reach it from the camp we had to cross a bridge built in three spans, and, perhaps, a hundred and fifty feet long. The troops of volunteers which paraded the streets this evening behaved very well. It was evident that even the mild discipline of a volunteer camp had its effect; and, as far as could be seen, there was not the slightest disturbance. I have heard a report since my return that a small riot had taken place between some of the 82nd and the civilians of the place. The only foundation for the report was a dispute between one of the 82nd and some other men at a so-called officer's club room within the camp. The disturbance was quickly ended by his captain marching him up to his quarters. With the exception of this, there was nothing to mar the excellent behaviour of the men throughout their stay in Sussex.

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE BATTLE. At ten o'clock the camp of the 82nd was tolerably quiet, the exertions of the afternoon having apparently calmed them down. Soon after turning in for the night, the temperature went down rapidly, accompanied with a heavy fog or dew. This happened every night we were here, and it was almost impossible to sleep on account of the cold. The men complained a good deal; and, I suppose, to make up for it, they began their merry joking long before sunrise. It must have been as early as three in the morning when every one seemed to be awake. However, all turned out to drill at six o'clock in very good condition. Somewhere about this time the battalion from St. John and soon after the two battalions from Halifax arrived and marched up to their camps in excellent style. They were headed by their bands and it was quite a stirring sight to see them. As they marched past the other camps they were loudly cheered.

GETTING INTO LINE. At ten o'clock all the troops were ordered to fall in, in full uniform, and then, soon after, the battalions could be seen marching out, each from its own encampment, in a long column, headed by its own band, to the Review ground. It was a very pretty sight to see them moving among the trees and at last take up the position assigned to them. Sometimes two or three battalions were moving at the same time, each band playing—which made it all the livelier, although possibly less musical. From the grand stand, immediately opposite the centre of the line of battalions, the view was very good. They stood in columns of companies, awaiting the arrival of the Governor General. The bands were united into one and stood behind them.

WHEN THE MARQUIS ARRIVED there was a grand salute given by presenting arms, and the bands playing "God save the Queen." This was not impressive, the distance being too great. Then the inspection took place, which I suppose proved satisfactory, as the columns were soon after extended in double line along the field. There was a short interval between each battalion, and when extended this double line was nearly half a mile long. Three Jeux-de-joue were then fired. The first was rather a failure, but the second and third were very good. It had a remarkable effect as it flashed up into the air and ran along the whole line, up the front rank and down the rear rank, in less time than you could count five. Then

THE MARCH PAST was begun. The bands were moved forward to within two hundred feet of the stand. The cavalry led. The horses were very steady, and when the lines passed the stand they were anything but straight. They were received in silence by the spectators, who, no doubt, did not understand the extreme difficulty of keeping up a straight line with cavalry. The artillery passed by as if they had been fastened together, and were loudly applauded. Then, I think, came the Halifax troops, who did very well, and were well received. Then came the 82nd. They did as well as the best, and were duly appreciated by the spectators, with whom the battalion seemed quite popular. The St. John men did very well also. There was less regularity among the other troops. They all returned and passed a second time, the cavalry and artillery at a gallop. Unfortunately this time the bands did not strike up properly. There was a confusion of time, and as the troops marched it unsteadily then all. The 82nd fared no better than the rest, its leading company even breaking its formation.

COLONEL DOMVILLE, who commanded the Hussars made quite a dashing cavalry officer. He galloped about the field a good deal accompanied by two orderlies. He seemed to have many friends on the ground. Once, when he was speaking to some friends near the stand, he sent his orderlies off on a message. By and by they came dashing back, the first one was carrying a chair, and the second, not to be outdone was carrying two chairs. These were handed to some ladies. This gallant action was much applauded. There was another incident just before the second march past. An old man, with a lame leg, started from the left of the stand across the field towards the band. He started in such a determined way that everybody began to laugh. He kept on, however, till he got to the band. There somebody evidently told him something that made him change his mind, for he turned round and made for the right of the stand hard as he could go. The people laughed more than ever, and began to clap him. This seemed to frighten him and he stumped along at a fearful rate evidently to get clear of some imaginary dan-
