Stranger in My Old Home Town

By Hal Murphy

Next morning after a mouth-watering breakfast and more animated conversation with my hostess, Mrs. Phee, I backed the Plymouth out of the yard and decided to have a daytime look around town. Except for the three filling stations, Main Street still looked the same. Morris Bernard's and Myrick's were still doing business at their old stands. Our old meeting place, Perry's, had closed its doors and the Perry family had moved away. I drove down a side street to have a quick look at our old bootlegger's house. Alas! The beer-stained building had disappeared and a large gaping hole was the only evidence left that the "House of Merriment" once entertained the gentlemen of the town with brimming cups of mild and bitter. By the appearance of departing guests, each cup grew less mild and more bitter as time flew hastily by. My next stop was the church. As I drove onto the church grounds and approached the red brick edifice with the towering spire, a little lump ran up and down my windpipe like a yo-yo. This impressive religious structure not only provides religious sanctuary for the townspeople, it serves as an inspiration for all its children who leave home in search of a new life in strange surroundings.

When a native son thinks of home, an image undimmed by the passage of time forms clearly in the mirror of his mind, the Tignish Church! Standing all these years in quiet dignity, its spire reaching towards the heavens, a beacon for the fisherman and farmer as they look up from their toil and check their location on the map of day as the setting sun frames the spire in its blazing lens when it sinks into its heavenly eradle. I may be wrong, but for almost startling beauty the Island sunset stands alone. Its golden rays paint the sky with vivid colors no artist could hope to match. As you watch this "Greatest Show in the Sky" your reaction is one of a by-stander watching a painter draw his masterpiece. I walked into the church, tipped toward the aisle, genuflected and knelt down in a pew. As I looked about me I noticed that the walls and pictures had been newly painted and restored to their original colors, but the pew, the pulpit and the altar remained unchanged. I became aware of how very quiet it was. My breathing could be heard and it seemed almost sacrilegious in this spiritual atmosphere. Suddenly I could hear music as my mother moved her graceful fingers over the keyboard, the wonderful tenor voice of Silvaire Arsenault broke through the stillness and blended perfectly with the heavy tones emanating from the powerful organ. Soon the walls of the grand old church echoed the sweetness and the thunder of many male voices as the choir, led by John Gaudet, lifted the hymn from the lips of the tenor and carried it to a resounding and wondrous climax!

Then I was alone; the music faded, my mother returned to her musical pedestal in heaven where I am sure, she is playing the organ for the heavenly choir, among its members the names of many who sang in the choir of St. Simon and St. Jude in the parish of Tignish. I blessed myself, genuflected, and walked out of the church and into the morning sunshine. Leaving the church grounds, I turned left and coasted down the road until I saw a house that struck a sharp chord on my memory harp. I swung into the yard and parked near the barn. Walking about, I noticed that everything looked about the same, — the house, the barn, everything was just as I had pictured it. I walked around to the back door and knocked. The door opened and a young woman whom I had identified as Frances Morrissey greeted me. "Hi, friend, come on in!" "I know me, Frances," I asked. "Can't say as I do!" she answered. "Don't you remember Marjorie's son, Hal?" "Well, for gosh sakes! Come on in, boy, the folks will be tickled to see you."

As I entered the kitchen, I saw a man sitting near the stove whom I immediately recognized as one of the roughest, toughest, and at times the gentlest, town of Tignish has ever produced. His name, Clarence Morrissey, he had aged some; the lines on his weather-beaten face were a little deeper; but his eyes still twinkled with merriment as they darted about the room and as I was to learn later, he still retained his rather salty vocabulary which had become famous all over the countryside for its stinging, rough, and at all times witty, quality. "Pop, know this man?" Frances teased. His wrinkled face showed the question mark planted within him as his eyes drilled into mine. "No," he answered slowly. "I can't seem to place him." "Come on, Pop," Frances said laughing. "You know this lad and his mother well." "But... but... who...?" he began. "Wait a minute. You're not Senator Murphy's son?" "Not quite, Mr. Morrissey, but you were close. I'm his grandson." "Well, for the love of Mike!" he exploded. "How are you, boy?" "Fine, Mr. Morrissey, and how are you feeling?" "Not too bad for an old fellow, and cut out that Mr. Morrissey business. Clarence is the name." Mrs. Morrissey joined us and over a cup of hot coffee, we discussed friends' births and deaths until I suggested a drive to North Cape and Clarence agreed to go with me. (To Be Continued)

From One Cook to Another by Mary Blake Carnation Home Service Director SERVE SOMETHING SPECIAL! Every woman has probably thought at one time or another of how she'd love to serve something extra special every day. Well, you can. I'm not thinking of recipes that call for lots of butter and eggs and cream—nor of steak or roast! I'm thinking of things like soups... casseroles dishes... and simple desserts... made creamy and tempting with Carnation Evaporated Milk. Because it is specially heat-refined, Carnation is unusually smooth and creamy and rich-tasting—gives luxurious appearance and flavor to your cooking! Even when undiluted Carnation is mixed with an equal amount of water for recipes that call for milk, it gives extra rich flavor and consistency. Undiluted, you can use economical Carnation to glorify meals in such recipes as: SPANISH CASSEROLE (Makes 4 to 6 servings) 1 large onion, chopped 2 tbsps. butter or dripping 1 pound ground beef 2 tbsps. flour 1 1/2 tpsps. salt 1/4 tsp. pepper 1 large can undiluted Carnation Evaporated Milk 2 cups cooked peas 1/2 cup diced red pimiento Unbaked tea biscuits Cook onion slowly in butter 3 minutes. Add beef; cook over low heat until brown, breaking up with fork as it cooks. Blend in flour, salt and pepper; stir in Carnation Milk, peas and pimiento. Stir while bringing to boil. Turn hot thickened mixture into greased 2-quart casserole. Top with unbaked tea biscuits. Bake in hot oven (400°F.) until biscuits are done through (about 25 minutes). (Instead of tea biscuits, you may use potatoes whipped with undiluted Carnation.)
