Contract Bridge

By Josephine Culbertson

AGAINST PROBABILITIES
South lost the slam contract in the following deal by playing against mathematical probabilities.

South dealer.
North-South vulnerable

♥	643	♣	1087
♠	J1073	♦	9542
♥	Q52	♣	98.

The bidding:
South West North East
2♣ Pass 3♣ Pass
4NT Pass 5♣ Pass
6♣ Pass Pass Pass

North was on questionable ground in giving a direct raise to South's two-club opening. Admittedly, the club queen was a good card, and so was the king of spades, but the "flat" pattern of North's holding depreciated these assets. The wiser course was first to bid two no-trump and see what action South chose to take from there. It is true that the final contract, to which North's immediate raise contributed so strongly, could have been made, but that was because the outstanding cards lay well for South.

West, shrewdly deciding to hold on to his ace, opened the heart queen. South won and "huddled". Obviously, he could discard his losing heart on dummy's fourth diamond, but the vital question was: Could he safely unblock the diamond suit before using the club queen as a final entry? The alternative plan was to draw trumps, cash the A-K-Q of diamonds in safety, and hope that the spade ace was on-side, so that the king could be used for entry to dummy.

South made the wrong decision. He laid down two top clubs from his own hand, then tried to unblock the diamond suit. West, of course, ruffed the third diamond and laid down the spade ace.

Mathematical probabilities strongly favored the other plan of play. The odds were two-to-one against a 3-3 break of six missing cards (as in diamonds); whereas there is a though there isn't a drop of fish blood in them, was proving himself now. Yes, sir, he was so, and those who saw it never will forget the sight.

Graywing the Gull and a lot of his friends saw it. So did Barker the Seal. It was one of the most exciting events any of them ever had seen, so exciting that some of those Gulls almost lost their voices from screaming. Excitement and screaming seem to go together. I wonder why? They all thought that Pilot was crazy. Even Graywing, who had known Pilot for a long, long time, was inclined to think so. You see everybody thought Pilot had led his followers into a trap. Even his followers who had trusted him blindly, following without question where he led, thought so. And because they thought so they were more frightened than ever. They were the crazy ones, crazy with fright. The Terrible One, the Killer Whale, most feared of all who swim the ocean, had appeared. Pilot had at once led the way into a lonely harbor, the Terrible One following. For a time it looked as if Pilot was so frightened that he didn't know what he was about or what he was doing, for he was headed straight for the shore, and no Whale can live on land.

But things are not always as they seem. Pilot knew exactly what he was doing, where he was going. There was a long island separated from the mainland by a fairly deep winding channel. Into this channel Pilot turned. He had been in there once before a long time ago when he was smaller than he was now. The water had been deep enough for him then. Was it deep enough now that he was so much bigger? And when he had been there before the tide had been higher. Of course that meant more water. Now it was not only lower but was still going out, getting still lower. They couldn't wait for the tide to turn for the Terrible One was already in the harbor. There could be no turning back.

So Pilot did not hesitate. He turned into that channel behind the island. In the middle the water was deep enough, but only in the middle. It was deep enough for him and of course for all his followers for none was bigger than he. But it wasn't deep enough for the Terrible One. He was sure of this. And because that channel was more or less winding he could make haste but slowly. There could be no headlong rushing as there had been in the open sea and the deeper water of the harbor.

So Pilot wisely slowed down. He swam as fast as he could and he sure of keeping in the channel and not going around, but no faster. To get stranded would be as bad as being caught by the Terrible One. So Pilot hurried carefully which is, of course, the only way to hurry.

Not so some of those behind him.

50 per cent chance that one card—the spade ace—here—lies right. South reasoned that this chance was reduced by the fact that West, holding the spade ace, would be tempted to lead that card and that his failure to do so more or less marked the ace off-side, but this was not a valid conclusion.
