English Pub Contains Variety Of Weapons

By JOHN FARROW

LONDON (AP)—Step up for a drink at The Cricketers and you're right in the firing line.

Antique guns drip from the ceiling. They pack the walls. Turn around and pistols, long guns, blunderbusses, lances, spears, daggers and bayonets face you.

Albert Warren, 63-year-old landlord of the 250-year-old pub in the London suburb of Croydon, reckons his little hostelry is unique.

"I doubt if there's one to match our display anywhere in the world," he said.

And so do the people who flock to the little inn—it holds 100 at the most—from miles around. Try to get in the door on a Saturday night or Sunday —and you'll be lucky.

Warren and his son, 39-year old Albert, have got together about 600 pieces from countries all over the world.

The guns and other items come from Britain, France, Belgium, Germany, United States, India, Turkey, Spain, Yugoslavia, Russia and Italy.

MEN WERE MEN THEN

Long guns used in the battles of the American west are there for the customers to see. They're six feet long and, commented Warren: "You needed to be men in those days to handle a rifle like that."

Matchlock . . . flintlock . . . Warren talks about his guns as a mother talks about her children.

His oldest gun dates back to the 16th century. Albert Junior, a skilled craftsman, is capable of overhauling every gun father and son buy at sales.

He's a member of the Muzzle Loading Society of Great Britain. "And he's fired nearly every gun we've got here," said his father.

But the pub's not just got guns. It has bayonets tracing the weapon's evolution over the last 300 years.

Albert could have continued pulling antiques out from all over the place—even down to one of the original boomerangs and an Irish shillelagh. Oh, by the way, you can still get a drink at The Cricketers. It's a friendly pub—despite the artillery.
