CHAPTER SIX

Part Two

Celia was white and shaken, and Ruby Fearle waited a moment for her to pull herself together. And then Ruby Fearle said quietly, 'Dees here mens what's coming tomorrow, Miss Celia - does you know 'em?'

Celia stood up, hesitated a moment and then turned and went blindly out of the kitchen, not toward the front of the house, but through the kitchen door and out into the glory of the summer night.

She did not know when Rusty Randolph came and sat beside her. She only knew that when, exhausted at last with the shock of her grief, she sat up, Rusty was there smiling at her in the moonlight, offering her his handkerchief, and with it, the wordless comfort of his presence.

Celia lifted her tear-stained face from his handkerchief and looked at him. In the moonlight that filtered through the thick-leaved branches above them she could scarcely more than guess at his expression but cried out sharply 'You listened?'

Rusty looked at her and shook his head a little. 'I'm disappointed in you, Celia. You're not really their daughter after all, are you? Don't you suppose they'd rather have had the happiness they've known, even if it has to end like this, than never to have known their kind of love?'

He looked at her uneasily. 'You think they've been happy enough to make up for this?' Celia looked at him questioningly. Rusty looked down at her and gave her a wry little smile, but his eyes remained bleak.

'I'll have to tell you something of my dad's story to make you understand that, won't I?' he said gently. 'Well, I'm sure he wouldn't mind. You see, he and Buzz were bosom pals. The fellows in the show called Buzz the best dressing-room comedian in the business. No matter how dull things got, dad and Buzz could dig up something to laugh at. Well, when Buzz and Mary Sue were married, it left Dad sort of high and dry, and he was easy pickin's for the lady who became my mother.'

He was silent for a moment, his eyes on the wet blade of grass he was pulling to pieces between his restless fingers. The moon had crept higher now, swinging across the star-sprinkled sky so that she could see his face more clearly. He looked up at her and his face was taut and set, his eyes dark something that had rankled in his soul for long years. To be continued
