The Birthday Murder

By Lange Lewis
CHAPTER SEVENTEEN
Part Two

When Hazel had gone, Victoria thought for the first time of another alternative. She recalled that a month before Hazel had filled the sugar bowl with salt. She had reached for the wrong green canister.

She went to the mirror of her dressing table and began to comb her crisp graying hair. Her own well-known face looked out at her while her hands performed this commonplace gesture.

It was impossible that she should become for all the world the enigmatic creature called into being by the fleeting notion that Albert had died from a dose of ant poison. It was impossible that she should become the Victoria Jason Hime whose husband had died of ant poison exactly as had the husband of her own fictitious creation, Ina Hart.

"Absolutely impossible," she repeated aloud, in a firm voice.

The compulsion came to go to Albert's room, as though seeing the place where Albert had died could provide her with some knowledge about Albert's death. The door opened easily, silently. The blankets were huddled over the foot of the bed. The sheets had some evidence taken there.

Abruptly a feeling of loss overcame her. That Albert had been Albert made his ending pitiful. A small, busy man, absorbed in his job. A man of shrewdness, of pride, of tact, who had suddenly and without dignity gone the way of beggars and kings. "Oh, Albert," she whispered, and felt tears start to her eyes.

A sound started her, the sharp sound of metal striking against cement. She turned her head toward the north window. The sound seemed to come from there.

Neatly framed by yellow curtains, an old man was standing at the edge of the driveway of the big house next door, which was perhaps two feet higher than the narrow side yard of her own house. A low white picket fence hid his feet, but she could see that his gnarled hand was clasped loosely about the handle of a garden spade, which had made the ringing, metallic sound she had just heard. His head was craned forward on its leathery old neck, and below the brim of a battered felt hat his faded blue eyes met hers squarely with the unconscious impertinence of intense curiosity.

She recognized him as the gardener who at Christmas time had handed her a bunch of poinsettias over the same fence. But there was no friendliness on his face today. He had smelled death.

Anger burst in her. With three sharp strides she reached the window and violently drew the curtain together, their metal rings clashing against the rod from which they hung. She found that she was panting in the dimness of the bedroom. The sound of her own breath coming and going reminded her of the breathing of an animal at bay.

The doorbell rang. It rang again before she realized that Hazel was not there to answer it. It was with reluctance that she went down the little hall ending at Albert's door, turned into the wider hall where the telephone was. For the first time she could remember, she went to her own door with a sense of dread of what might be waiting there.

It was a messenger boy. He was chewing gum. He matters-of-factly handed a long green florist's box over the lower half of the door. She set it down on the dining table to open it. Inside were two dozen long-stemmed red roses, her favorite flower. A small white envelope was pinned to the clear green wax paper which had covered the flowers. A white card was inside.

"Sawn."

W.C.T.U. NOTES

SOCIALLY ACCEPTABLE; MORALLY WRONG

(Norman M. Lovein)

That the poison peddlers and their advertisers have succeeded in making their potions socially acceptable is all too true. People are drinking like mad and all too few gatherings are held where drinks are not offered and expected. Business men feel they must oil their deals with alcohol, social gatherings must be "graced" with cocktails, conventions must afford a well stocked bar or the convention falls flat.

Wherever one goes, if it is a public gathering place, he is most likely to see some alcoholic beverage holding a place of prominence. And the people who are doing the drinking—many of them, far too many of them—are church people who, all their lives, have been taught that drinking is wrong. Many others are young people who are being recruited and numbered among the drinkers. People have been led to feel they do not belong if they refuse to drink. They almost feel guilty and rather than experience any unpleasantness they swallow their convictions and join the drinking crowd.

All of this is true, but this further fact is also true: drinking is still morally wrong. The conventions of society cannot do away with that fact. The teachings of the church about this matter cannot be ignored without a feeling of guilt attaching itself to the one who does the ignoring. And many people who are having trouble with their religious experiences know full well that it is the cocktail glass that is standing between them and God. And no denying of the practice by the drinkers will relieve them of this sense of guilt.

We remind ourselves that God has never called his people to be popular; he called them to be peculiar and, if people are not willing to be peculiar enough to say "no, thank you" when offered something that violates their convictions, then such persons are headed for trouble with their religious experiences. Socially acceptable? Certainly. But morally wrong, too—as thousands could testify who are trying to live in two worlds at once and who find themselves miserable in both of them.

Today

Is faith asleep—let's wake it.
Today is ours—let's live it.
And love is strong—let's give it.
A song can help—let's sing it.
And peace is dear—let's bring it.
The past is done—don't rue it.
Our work is here—let's do it.
The world is wrong—let's fight it.
The road is rough—let's clear it.
The future vast—don't fear it.
Today is free—let's take it.

Autumn Night

(By F. H. MacArthur)

Beautiful Autumn, peaceful and calm,
Pouring a healing, wonderful balm;
Leaves changed to colors, lovely to see,
Dressed like a bride in her hour of glee.
Pale shines the Moon, your diadem light
Wonderful, magical Autumn night!
Forest and meadow, river and stream,
Valley and hillside, lie in a dream;
Murmuring breezes sing a new song
Hark! To their voices sweeping along;
Pure is the spirit filled with your light,
Wonderful, magical Autumn night!
