Opening each king of hearts. One frequent form of defense against a suit contract is to try to run the declarer out of trumps by forcing him to ruff some suit in which he is weak. This is particularly true where the defender has five trumps to declarer's eight.

A typical case is this one where South ruffed the second heart lead, played a low spade to the king, and finessed the jack on the return, losing to the queen.

West led another heart and declarer ruffed again; south was now down to the lone ace of spades, having led trumps twice and ruffed twice. After cashing the ace to draw West's ten, declarer crossed to dummy with a club and led the ten of diamonds and finessed. West took the king and cashed two hearts to defeat the contract two tricks. The repeated heart leads had weakened South sufficiently in trumps to bring about his downfall.

But analysis of South's play shows he did not take the proper measures to protect against the situation which developed. He could have made the contract by exercising better trump control.

After ruffing the heart at trick two, declarer should enter dummy with a club and finesse the ten of diamonds. If the finesse wins, the contract is practically sure to make.

But if, in the actual case, the finesse loses, South is in better position to withstand the heart return. He ruffs the heart and now has the A-J-6 of spades left. The diamond suit is already established.

A low trump is then led to the king and another trump played back. But declarer goes up with the ace, the finesse being rejected. When West follows, and whether the queen has appeared or not, the contract is sure to make. Declarer simply keeps leading his high cards, permitting the queen of spades to make whenever the defense chooses to take it. He thus makes ten tricks.

In effect, South plays for the normal 3-2 division of the outstanding trumps. This reasonable assumption offers the best chance of success.

RIPLEY'S BELIEVE IT OR NOT

Millions of acres are still available in Alaska under the homesteading act, which permits a man to take over a 160-acre tract for the cost of administrative fees. During a period of years—the time limit varies—he can earn title to the land if he turns it into a successful farm.

However, staggering obstacles block the road to success in the venture. State officials reluctantly predict a majority of would-be homesteaders will wind up discouraged, jobless and possibly in relief.

James W. Wilson, acting director of the state's division of agriculture at Palmer, in the heart of Alaska's lush est farmland, puts it bluntly:

"People with no better than average ability and with limited financial backing can expect to find homesteading a very discouraging enterprise." He adds: "Farming anywhere is a business requiring a sizable investment. The 'free' land on the homestead costs about $200 an acre to clear. Unless a person knows where his investment capital is coming from, he's in trouble."

EXPENSIVE VENTURES
 The federal bureau of land management gives this estimate: "By the time the land is cleared, a home and barn built, machinery, animals and equipment acquired, a homesteader may have $61,000 and 10 years of hard labor invested in his under-sized tract."

Even then, success isn't assured. Once the homesteader is in production, he's in a business of limited markets.

The bulk of foodstuffs consumed by Alaska's 213,000 residents is shipped in from other areas. Improving the local distribution is one of the big jobs facing established farmers and new homesteaders.
