

GRACE WELDON.

FREDERICA, THE BONNET-GIRL.

CHAPTER XVII. Continued.

It would appear that something has confused you, sir, said Mr. Weldon, almost angrily.

Yes sir! He has, without question, been carrying on a deep game!

What more? Four hours after, the boy returned and deposited one thousand dollars in your credit!

To my credit? Yes, precisely. This is becoming more and more intricate!

What was correct. I sent him to the bank with Mr. Daily to the counting-room by Captain Evans.

Yes, sir, but not twenty minutes after, the same lad comes in with a note from you, signed and sealed by Mr. Daily, enclosing a check for twenty-five hundred dollars.

Is this credible? Here is both the note and the check. I did not pay it, resolved first to come and see you as soon as I could leave the bank.

Forgery! exclaimed the cashier, with grave severity. Forgery! exclaimed the merchant.

Well, sir, answered Mr. Weldon, scarcely able to speak in an audible manner.

Three weeks since, as our books show, you had deposited seventeen thousand dollars.

The next day you drew out twelve thousand!

I believe I did, Mr. Daily will satisfy you.

And you did pay it? I did, sir.

And notified me. By whom? The young man.

And you did pay it? I did, sir.
