Britain Recruits Italians For Mines, Railways

LONDON, Nov. 26.—(AP)—Britain is recruiting jobless Italians to help fill its manpower needs in its state-owned coal mines and railways. By the end of the year, this country expects to have 1,000 Italians working in coal pits, and an equal number laboring on railways. These 2,000 Italians admittedly make only a small dent in Italy's problem of 2,000,000 jobless, but it helps and both countries benefit.

Italians are sent only to pits where the leaders of the local union welcome them. This has been about one out of every five.

Coal Board officials say objections of local unions to use of Italians stem from the depression days and mainly are based on the argument that Italian workers may some day affect the conditions of work and pay of British miners.

The Coal Board's reply is that Britain will need all of the coal it can produce and that the Italians must start at the lowest paid jobs.

The project to bring in railway laborers from Italy started this month with the arrival of 150. Some 850 more are expected before the end of the year.

They will be used on unskilled laboring jobs, mainly as section hands. They are being given no language course or any special training. The government-owned railways are giving them basic instruction booklets in Italian and employees who speak Italian will work with the recruits.

The Italians will be paid the same scale as Britons. The weekly starting pay is £5, five shillings in the London area.

The National Union of Railwaymen has made no objection to the Italian workers.

a barrier between herself and family that will never be broken down. Don't let this happen, for your own sake and your daughter's. Don't make her give up church activities, but try gently to divert her attention into other channels, too. Her fear of criticism and of new undertakings is nothing but fear of her father applied to her outside life. If you can, by any means, convince your husband of the harm being done to his daughter, he may change. Talks with the clergyman of your church, and with the child's teachers may also prove helpful.

DEAR MISS DIX: The parents of my boy friend are putting him through college. He has two more years to go. We want to get married as soon as possible because we miss each other so much. I know we are young (I am 18, he is 20). I make $30 a week and would like to know how we can get married and be together while he finishes college.

ANSWER: It is extremely difficult for a young man to get through college and maintain a home at the same time. In recent years many boys have done it, but they were being aided by the government and were older than your friend. I would advise you to wait until your young man has finished school. With a life time ahead of you, don't jeopardize your own happiness or his chances for an education by marrying now. His parents probably have an opinion in the matter, too, and as they are making the sacrifice to see that he gets a college degree, they should be consulted about your problem, too. If you begin married life by defying the wishes of others, you're making a very wrong start.

DEAR MISS DIX: Is it considered bad taste for a wife to engage in social activities that exclude her husband?

ANSWER: There are certain activities that must be pursued by the wife alone, and rather than being in bad taste it is almost obligatory for her to join them. Women's clubs are doing marvelous work today with youth problems and civic improvement. Most meetings of this type are held during the day so they seldom interfere with the household routine as it concerns the husband.

Such activities as dances, or parties which couples usually attend together, are another point. Unless the group is made up of very close friends, and her husband has a good reason for not attending, the wife should stay away, too.

now presided over by a gracious young matron, an ex-school ma'am? What should it be like to make it a lovely complement to the out-of-door holdings? While many of its old lines have been retained, alterations have been made to make it modern, both attractive and convenient to the housewife, an altogether pleasant place in which to dwell. "Why do boys ever want to leave the farm?" James spoke into the comfortable silence of our homing; thought dwelling on the scenes he had left. "That" we returned "is a puzzling question!"

And at Alderley in an endeavour, sparked to an excitement which brought granddaughter on the run to announce "My grandfather wants you — and 'right now' he said 'and not tomorrow!'" the young cattle were stabled this afternoon. Because winter, or perhaps 'tis but a foretaste of it, came to the farmlands today! Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night
