

Japanese Nearly Panic As March A-Tests Approach

TOKYO (Reuters) — Japanese fears of British nuclear bomb tests are producing booms in some business circles.

Salesmen peddling "radioactive proof" clothing and umbrellas are thriving.

Fish dealers are inviting customers to register now if they want "radioactive-free fish" next month.

Grocers are selling baskets of canned food to hoarding housewives.

These extraordinary measures are being taken by Japanese from all walks of life. They are indicative of the serious concern of the Japanese over the continuation of nuclear tests in the Pacific.

Britain plans to explode a variety of bombs at Christmas Island in March despite two Japanese protests. Britain already has rejected one of the protests.

ing here for the Pacific ocean ports have been issued with protective gear for use if they should come too close to the danger area.

Japanese government members privately concede there is little hope that Britain will abandon the tests.

CLAIM COMPENSATION

But should any Japanese national suffer injury or damage as a result of the tests, the government plans to claim compensation from Britain.

A reliable cabinet source said the government would be satisfied if the present controversy could be used to good purpose in the United Nations to formulate a policy that would completely prohibit all future nuclear weapon tests.

The present concern over the tests is devoid of any widespread anti-British feeling.

Petitions circulated here condemning Britain resulted in a total of 34 signatures, according to Iku Yasui, secretary-general of the Japanese Council for the Prohibition of Atomic and Hydrogen Weapons.

Most of the bitterness generated against Britain here has been confined to the Japanese fishing groups.

Isao Koide, president of the Japanese Tuna Fisheries Association said his industry faces financial loss since the danger area designated by the British government contains some of the best Japanese fishing grounds.

REMEMBER HORRORS

The Japanese, who remember the horrors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, are fearful that their islands once again will be contaminated by radioactive fallout.

Japanese scientists say the tests may dangerously increase the amount of strontium 90 in the atmosphere over Japan and have serious genetic effects on future Japanese generations.

To keep the public informed on possible British radioactive fallout, 13 observatories have been equipped with special instruments.

Soviet Foreign Minister Appeals To Indian Peoples

The plan was proposed in a report by Communist party leader Nikita Khrushchev to the plenary session of the party's central committee held here last week.
