

Fine Reconstruction Job Of Old Bristol Milldam

This is a fish story with implications which may be of great value to the tourist industry of Prince Edward Island in the years to come. It began last autumn, when Mr. Willard Jordan, local business man, toyed with the idea of reconstructing a milldam according to plans of his own devising. His idea was not new, but the execution of it had some original features. He decided to buy an old milldam property, which had an outlet on a stream leading to salt water, and to reconstruct the dam as to make it easy for salt water trout to reach the pond.

Many years ago, this problem was solved in a fashion, by building fish ladders which the trout could ascend as though climbing a stair-way. The ladders were thought necessary because as a rule mill-dams are quite high, and there is usually a considerable drop from the spill-way to the stream below. Unfortunately, some people took advantage of the fact that sea trout in the process of climbing these ladders were easier to catch than in deep water.

Mr. Jordan bought the old milldam at Bristol, Lot 40, after a consultation with Mr. Stewart MacKay of Parkdale, who had been thinking over a similar project for several years. The plan was simplicity itself. Mr. Jordan proposed to remove the old spill-way of the dam at Bristol, which had partially collapsed before, and to construct a dam on a solid barrier of earth, with no timber of any kind to buttress it.

Mr. MacKay did this work quickly with a bulldozer. Then the new and untried feature of the scheme was carried out. The bulldozer moved down one side of the pond about fifty yards, and began cutting a new river bed semi-circular in shape and leading down to the old millstream. This cutting is now being referred to as a bypass.

The new entrance into the pond is not faced with timber or concrete, and is just deep enough to drain off the normal overflow of water each day. By making the new river bed semi-circular, it was possible to ease the steep descent, and avoid a too abrupt drop to the original brook. The cutting is roughly about the same width as the brook of which it is an extension.

Shares Expenses
Before proceeding with the actual work, Mr. Jordan interested two other Charlottetown men, Mr. Gordon Hughes and Mr. Norman MacLeod, and they shared in the financial outlay.

New Home Of Burns Jewellers

Almost three hundred persons visited the new home of Burns Jewellers last evening when it was opened for the first time for inspection by the public.

Located at the former Piokard showroom on Great George Street, the new store is a definite stride forward in modernization and pleasant surroundings. Large, brightly lit show-windows are ideally suited to the display of smaller items carried, and the spacious interior is emphasized by the careful choice of display fixtures and color scheme.

Using showcases and fixtures in a lined finish, Mr. Bryan Burns has chosen background colours and focal points of color with an eye to creating interest in the articles displayed.

Cobalt blue in two shades is used in the interior of all cases, and the unusual but attractive combination of salmon, apple green and slate grey form a most attractive setting for the very light woodwork.

Clever lighting on the pale blue ceiling, and spotlights over various displays, round out the decoration of one of this city's more attractive stores.

Many beautiful congratulatory bouquets were seen last evening by those who visited the new store to browse and to wish Mr. Burns every success.
