The conference, first of its kind in Canada, was sponsored by the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers to obtain a guideline policy to combat pollution problems.

Delegates worked in closed study sessions. Their final report was made to the resource ministers of the 10 provinces and the federal government Friday.

There was general agreement that a single federal agency or organization should be established.

This body, the report said, should establish a national pollution abatement code, coordinate the preparation, collection and dissemination of pollution facts and conduct research.

It also should encourage provincial governments to meet and resolve interprovincial pollution problems and provide a means of adjudicating disputes.

The federal agency should provide a broad scale of technical assistance to "other levels of government" and provide a set of national analytical standards.

At the provincial level, the delegates urged, each government should establish co-ordinating agencies and make and enforce regulations.

The report came as a surprise to some observers. Delegates during the week had repeatedly said the federal government could not set standards because under the British North America Act resources come under provincial jurisdiction.

The report said current anti-pollution research in Canada is modest and that it is in water pollution. There is some investigation of soil pollution, but little with air and this is something delegates felt needs urgent study.

The report made particular mention of the need for technological advances in the removal of oxides of nitrogen from automobile exhausts and large fuel-burning installations.

The guideline on water said its pollution must be recognized as the most widespread problem and should be given priority in remedial programs.

Delegates considered current action in water pollution control generally insufficient, sometimes misdirected, wasteful and uncoordinated.

In water pollution control the order of priority should be (1) domestic and other wastes which may create a hazard to public health or the safety of humans and (2) wastes which may be damaging to any part of the environment.

In a closing statement, Jean Luc Pepin, federal minister of energy, mines and resources, said representatives of government, industry and other groups participating in the meetings—and in the general planning and preparation for the conference—set a pattern for co-operation and joint action essential for effective pollution control throughout Canada.

Only maximum co-operation and joint action would make possible effective handling of the problems.

British Natural Gas Prices Brew New Storm In Industry

LONDON (CP)—A new storm is brewing in Britain's fledgling natural gas industry with reports that a government steering committee wants the average wholesale price of North Sea gas pegged at two pence a therm, a unit equivalent to about 100 cubic feet of gas.

William Ogilvie of Ottawa, managing director of Home Oil of Canada Ltd., a wholly-owned Canadian subsidiary, said Friday gas drillers would cease exploration if the government tries to enforce that price.

"It is obviously too low," said Ogilvie, whose company has struck a big gas reservoir on the Yorkshire moors. "Because we are on land, we can possibly operate at a price lower than

CONTRACT BRIDGE

The bidding:

West	North	East	South
Pass	1♠	1♠	1NT
Pass	2NT	Pass	3NT

Opening lead—ten of spades. The bidding by the opponents frequently determines the course of play adopted by the declarer. For example, take this hand which shows how the bidding can vitally affect the play.

West led a heart. East won with the king and returned the jack. Declarer won with the queen and now had to decide which suit to play next.

Let's suppose he had led a spade to the queen to force out the ace. East would win and play another heart, thus establishing two heart tricks for West.

Declarer would eventually have to attack diamonds, but whenever he did so, West would take the ace and cash his hearts to defeat the contract one trick, the defense collecting three hearts and two aces in all.

But suppose declarer attacks diamonds right away, rather than spades. Then he makes the contract regardless of how the opponents defend. If West refuses the first diamond lead, South persists with another one.

Whether West wins this one or not, his hearts drop out of the picture. If he takes the ace, he has no further entry to cash his hearts even though he establishes them; if he refuses the second diamond, South abandons the suit and forces out the ace of spades to assure nine tricks.

Obviously, the crux of the hand is to choose the right suit to attack, but which suit South should play first is certainly not a matter of luck. In making his choice, South goes back to the bidding for guidance.

It is more reasonable to assume that East's spade bid was based on a suit headed by the ace than on one headed by the nine. South therefore proceeds on the assumption that East has the ace of spades.

He has no way of knowing which opponent has the ace of diamonds, but he attacks that suit first to make sure that West's hearts are neutralized in case he does have the diamond ace.

those exploring of the North Sea, but that price would be even too low for us. We would be inclined to pick up our marbles and go home.

The two-penny price was reported recommended by Prime Minister Wilson's steering committee, which includes a number of high-ranking treasury officials.

One London newspaper reported that Sir Henry Jones, council chairman, is likely to put forward the price 14 pence to two pence a therm at his next negotiating meeting with North Sea companies.

If the talks fail, the power minister then will have to step in to settle the dispute.
