A PAIR OF BAD MEN.

THE WIFE OF TEXAS AND SAM SAUNDERS OF NEW MEXICO.

The former's daring challenge to a hand of Buller's—Jim White does the rest of the killing today—How Sam Saunders opened a Prayer Meeting.

It was Sheriff Jim White of El Paso, Tex., who was the best type of the genuine bad man I ever knew. He was a gentleman, cultured and refined, a good conversationalist, and a pleasant companion. I met him first in 1882, when he was an inspector of customs at El Paso under Collector Abner Tibbatts, and to look at him one would have supposed that beneath that calm exterior, that was unknown to him and that he had frequently faced death against fearful odds.

Three dead and wounded citizens lay in the street—the rustlers had found shelter behind the cottonwood trees which stood along the sidewalks. Here and there were venturesome heads and arms or men who were endeavoring to pick the second shells off with their rifle from behind closed blinds, but the town was practically in possession of the desperado, having only the opposition of Mr. Burtas, who with his revolver had raved up and down the dusty street, blowing his rifle into blue vapor, as she poured out her wrath and exclamation upon the soundless.

Then Jim White appeared. Alone with a calmer head than in each hand, he sprang into the middle of the street shouting, "Jim White does the rest of the killing today!" This was a boast, but he made it good. His rifle shattered the head of a man who exposed it in an attempt to bring White down with a rifle shot, but the bullet did almost simultaneously sent a bullet into the shoulder of another rustler. The remaining half dozen desperados made a dash from their hiding places down the street in an effort to reach the place where their horses were tied. White never moved from his position in the center of the street, and he sent three after the fugitives in such a way that they were in range. Four out of five of his missiles found their mark, and the fugitives who escaped never returned to El Paso again.

An entirely different and much more numerous type of the western bad man could be found in Sam Saunders, a first class in the name of N. M. A. desperado of the name of "Doc" Cane had just killed an innocent man, a railroad conductor, or, named Richard Fabler, and Saunders, who was then in the government employ as an inspector of customs and engaged in riding the Mexican boundary line west of El Paso, Texas, had been in the act of stopping a train, when he was asked by the citizens to notify Cane that he must leave town. Saunders accepted the task without any hesitation, and he was walking up Cane said to him: "Get out of here now. I'll blow a hole through you if you are in sight more than three minutes." Cane looked into the small, twinkling eyes of Saunders, and then, without a word, started west along the track of the Southern Pacific railroad. He was heard of next at a little ranch close down to the Mexican line, where the horse thieves and cattle smugglers found safe harbor.

Finally a considerable number of stolen and smuggled horses were reported to have been gathered at the ranch. Saunders heard of it and rode off alone to investigate. After a long search of five days he returned, bringing with him a dozen horses which he had "stolen" out of the "smugglers' corral at night. The event so shocked the eyes of the citizens where it occurred that they sent word to Saunders, who was made to say his prayer, "If he ever rode into that camp again, I'll shoot him down." Saunders' ears, he promptly saddled up and put out for the boundary line.

"There's no necessity for your running into danger there now," said the deputy collector.

"Yes, there is," was Saunders' reply. "If there's any camp along that line which I cannot ride into I may well throw up my commission." He reached the camp about dusk one day, but Cane had not yet returned, and the first thing Mr. Saunders knew he heard the command, "Hands up!" and there in the sage brush, not 100 paces off, stood his old enemy, "Doc" Cane, with his right eye gleaming behind "a big 45."

"You've got me. I surrender," said Saunders as he dropped off his horse with his hands above his head.

"Now, thank your blank eyes, I am going to give you a lesson," said Cane, "shooting's too good for the likes of you, and the boys have decided to make an example of you that won't be forgotten by your blank tribe of customs officers for awhile—come here, you long-legged scoundrel."

Saunders began to whine and to beg. He held his hands up and advanced trembling, apparently to surrender. All this time his wits had been at work, however, and he saw that Cane was alone. Tremblingly he approached his captor, and with a motion of his hand he drew his own gun and fired Cane to the earth with it. Like a flash one of Saunders' long legs shot upward, kicking the pistol arm. Cane sprang upon the "crazy bone," the heavy 45 was discharged as it flew out of the desperado's hand, but the bullet went wide of its mark, and in one time and half a motion Saunders drew his own gun and fired Cane to the earth with it. "It's a prayer meeting you want, eh? Well, your friends can pray for you after that blow, I guess."

Before riding off Saunders fired half a dozen shots from his revolver into the air as a sort of notification to the little camp, not 500 yards distant, that "something was up." Cane was not killed; his friends found him 10 minutes after Saunders' departure and carried him into camp. The Editor never by any means forgot the breaking up of that smugglers' ranch was not accomplished by regular legal methods, but as the deputy collector said to me the result was the most satisfactory. "Doc" Cane's crowd haven't done any smuggling since.—Exchange.
