

Korea Flag: Good vs Evil

THE KOREAN FLAG, now being carried into battle in defense of the youthful nation, is one of the world's oldest. It is the epitome of Oriental philosophy, and tells quite a story, once you are familiar with it.

In the center is a circle, divided by an S-shaped line. This is the ancient yin and yang symbol which originated in China in almost prehistoric times. One portion of the circle is red, the other blue. The red part represents good, and the blue, evil. They also can signify happiness and sorrow, health and disease, or any two things that are exact opposites. Here is where the interesting philosophy comes in.

Draw any line that passes through the center of the circle. No matter where your line falls, the two halves will contain some good, and some evil. As your eye wanders around the circle, the red "good" will slowly decrease, and the blue "evil" will grow. Then the "evil" wanes, and the "good" dominates. The important thing to remember is that on the flag, just as in life, there is always some good and some evil; some of the bitter and some of the sweet.

Grouped around the circle are four sets of dashes. These are also good and evil symbols, with the longer marks being the beneficial ones. They, too, wax and wane as their course is followed around the flag.

The philosophy that life is an ever changing pattern of good times mixed with the bad, followed by dire days with a faint ray of hope for the future, has given Orientals the fortitude to survive thousands of years of war, pestilence, and famine. The Korean flag embodies that philosophy.

the meal, we agreed it was "like old times again."

Sister-to-James is brown of eye, and now has graying tresses. And once upon a time she taught the classes in the school down the river road, where she encouraged, and directed, those that in time went out to grace and enrich many a calling and profession. She was one of those of the year—by and very choice order of femininity, who presuming to intrude into a realm which had been hitherto owned by the masculine line, modestly we are sure, yet casually and brilliantly, in time, carried home Diplomas which granted them First Class Licences to teach. In the turn of the years this became a more common practice, as the fair sex in increased numbers matched brains with their branny contemporaries. But owing to a father who was School Secretary over a number of years, we can recall that this was a credential extraordinary to present before the eyes of the worthy trustees. "Of the fir-st class," it says here—and she but a bit of a gir-r-r!! I don't know at all, how it will wor-r-rrk out, I'm sure!"

It is quick of turn and of mind; fond of reading and music; of art and drama, but familiar, as well with every twist and turn of the farming, counselling children and grandchildren wisely, she is one who finds no barriers in creeds or persuasions but claims friends everywhere for their true worth. She has a deft hand with the wee fowls that belong to Spring farming, and green fingers to handle the plants and flowers. "Now tell me," James wanted to know, "do you hold with these feather-brained creatures that must have their hair 'done' at

of a rose with an important meaning for us, so far as we know, is a Minoan fresco dating from the ancient civilization of Crete, the land of the Minotaur. It is a wall painting, one of the many wall-frescoes of Minoan plants and animals. It was discovered by Sir Arthur Evans early in the present century, in the excavations of the palace of King Minos in Crete. The rose became the favorite flower of the Greeks and in their celebrations the rose was the queen of flowers. The island of Rhodes was derived from the Greek word for rose which is rhodon. For many centuries, the Rhodians stamped a rose symbolically onto their coins. The literature of the Roman Empire has many general references to roses, rosaria, or gardens, and the cultivation of roses.

"The Glory of one Red Rose".
"If some despicable decree should pluck from the gardens of the earth all their flowers except one—and it were left for me to decide which bright blossom should remain to bless the hungry eye—I would choose the red Rose. As the Gospel of John catches up the spirit of all the other Gospels, a red Rose holds within her velvet petals, the fragrance and beauty that prompts the heart to plant a garden. The gate of life swings to and fro, and soon, too soon, it closes, and that is why beside my door I grow red roses, in a sentiment so universal it becomes the anthem of those who worship at its lovely fragrant altar."

beauty parlors?" And he nodded towards his weaker half. "Oh yes," she laughed, touching her own becoming hair-do. "I hold—and follow many of the present-day practices, though there are a few that I'm afraid I could never master. I guess that's what comes of being born to a Victorian era!" This then is sister-to-James, mother of four, grandmother of six, a womanly woman, our guest at Alderlea over the recent weekend.

And Jamie? Jamie was away in a twinkling this morning, when he scented word of an outing to the city, leaving granddaughter rather lonely. "If this is his holiday, why can't he stay with us here?" she complained, but forgot it presently when she too was taken on a trip thither. And a rippling breeze, sunny and lovely, set satiny shadows on the afternoon haylands which according to our farmers, "have thickened—surprisingly!"
