

Two Can Sing

by James M. Cain

CHAPTER SEVEN

Part Two

"You mean, that it's nice, and silly and cockeyed, and I should be here with you and that I should be an opera singer, when all God intended me for was a dumb contractor, and that it's a big joke that came off just the way you hoped it would, and—something like that?"

"Yes, that's what I mean." "Then, yes." "Let's dance."

We danced, and I held her close, and smelled her hair, and she nestled it up against my face. "It's a joy, isn't it?"

"Yes, almost happy, Leonard." "Me, too."

"Let's go back to our little booth. I want to be kissed."

So we went back to the booth and she got kissed, and we laughed about the way I had hid from Mario, and I drank the wine and ate steak. I had to cut the steak left-handed, so I wouldn't joggle her head, where it seemed to be parked on my right shoulder.

We stayed a second week in Chicago and I did my three operas over again, and then we played a week in Cleveland and another in Indianapolis. Then Cecil's contract was up, and it was time for her to go back and get ready for the New York season.

The Saturday matinee in Indianapolis was "Faust." I met Cecil in the main dining-room that morning, around ten o'clock, for breakfast, and while we were eating, Rossi came over and sat down. He didn't have much to say. He kept asking the waiter if any call had come for him and bit his fingernails, and pretty soon it came out that the guy who was to sing Wagner that afternoon wouldn't come to the theater, on account of a writ his wife would serve on him if he showed up there, and that Rossi was waiting to find out if some singer in Chicago could come down and do it. His call came through, and when he came back he said his wife was tied up. That meant somebody from the chorus would have to do it, and that was not so good.

And then Cecil popped out: "Well, what are we talking about, with him sitting here. Here, baby; here's my key. There's a score up in my room. You can just hike yourself up there and learn it."

"What! Learn it in one morning and then sing it?" "There are only a few pages of it," Cecil said. "Faust is in French, isn't it? I said, helplessly.

"Oh, dear. He doesn't sing French." But Rossi fixed that part up. He had a score in Italian and I was to learn it in that and sing it in that, with the rest of them singing French. So the next thing I knew I was up there in my room with a score, and by one o'clock I had it learned, and by two o'clock Rossi had given me the business and by three o'clock I was in a costume they dug up, out there doing it.

That made more impression on them than anything I had done yet. You see, they don't pay much attention to a guy who knows three roles, all coached up by heart. They know all about them. But a guy who can get a role up quick and go out there and do it, even if he makes a few mistakes, that guy can really be some use around an opera company.

Rossi came to my dressing-room after I finished in "Traviata" that night and offered me a contract for the rest of the season. He said Mr. Mario was very much pleased with me, especially the way I had done in Wagner. He offered me $150 a week. I thanked him and said no. He came up to $175. I still said no. He came up to $200. I still said no, and asked him not to bid any higher, as it wasn't a question of money. He couldn't figure it out, but after a while he shook hands and that was that.

Ellen's Diary

"But supposing she doesn't hear it!" she said breathlessly.

A love-song... anonymous with spring-time. As much a part of it as pushing blade of grass and unfolding bud—as first flowers and drying brown earth. And we saw a hundred lovers slipping at the edge of a twilight that was scented with the fresh fragrance of washed sod and tree in quest of their romances—on a city street, along a country lane... whistling a bar of an old-time song or singing the air, the melody inexpressibly sweet since it came from a full heart.

"Strange" James remarked only recently of this "we never hear any lad whistling or singing on the road in passing, as we used to in the long ago, Ellen? Don't you remember along about this time of year, we'd be bound to—and wasn't it nice, Ellen? ... on the night air it seemed to be part of the season—I guess it was the war years. To my mind folks haven't been so happy since the first war; it did something to all of us—sort of left its shadow on the world."

Yet through the sunny hours of spring, birds still carry their intriguing love-songs. And if perhaps not so obvious in their courting as once, lads still pursue some spring-time route to find mutual affection and esteem at the end of their quest.
