Dorothy Dix Says

he would if he married his first depends entirely upon the woman and which one would be the most congenial to him. Possibly the first love might have been his predestined mate, but it is more likely to have been the second, because generally a boy's first love is his teacher or some woman old enough to be his mother.

First love is a beautiful theme for the poet, but in real life it is a snare and a delusion from which most of us are mercifully saved by a beneficent Providence.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: I am married to the sweetest man on earth. No man could be kinder, more devoted or more generous to a wife than he is to me. Never scolds, never reprimands me, no matter how extravagant I am or how inefficient. But I don't love him. I am mean, nagging and despicable. I neglect my housework shamefully. If I tell him I don't love him and leave him, he will be so desperate that he will ruin himself. If I leave him, for me it will mean having to take a housemaid's job for some other woman instead of having my own beautiful house and car. What shall I do? I am the most unhappy person alive.

MRS. A. J.
ANSWER: You have thought and thought about not being in love with your husband, and about his not being the romantic hero of your girlish dreams until you have worked yourself up into a state of hysteria where you are suffering all sorts of psychopathic pains and having a perfectly gorgeous time being miserable about nothing.

My advice to you is this: Quit thinking about yourself so much and think a little about the splendid man to whom you are married. Don't be wicked enough to ruin his life by letting him find out how you feel about him, or by leaving him. Have enough courage to carry on and keep up the deception and make him happy. Suppose you are not ardently in love with him. You like him and respect him and admire him. That is the real basis on which all friendship is founded, and friendship is a mighty good substitute for love.

And don't forget this: The best way in the world to cultivate love is by doing something for someone. Get busy doing things for your good husband of yours. Think of him instead of yourself and you will find that you are drawn to him in a way that you have believed impossible, and you will find happiness yourself.

DEAR MISS DIX: A business man in his early fifties and a business woman of forty are very much in love with each other and are considering marriage. Is the difference in their age an obstacle?

H. F.
ANSWER: Certainly not. They are practically in the same age class, since women age more quickly than men do. Their tastes are settled. They know what they want in a husband or wife and the matter of a few additional years one way or the other is negligible.

DOROTHY DIX cannot reply personally to readers, but will answer problems of general interest through her column.

Murder Could Not Kill

INSTALLMENT 14

With something of a flourish, Lessing removed his silk hat and advanced to Barbara, who extended her right hand. He bowed with a proprietary air and brushed her hands with his lips.

"Evening Gideon," he said easily. "I thought I'd find you here. Been explaining to Barbara about our little scheme?"

"No," the other answered quickly. "I thought it best to leave you to do that."

"But you've told her, surely, that you're not going down to Winghamton?"

"Oh, yes; I've told her that. But I don't think Miss van Buren is greatly concerned about my not going down."

"You've said it, Gideon," she assured him with a sudden burst of gaiety. "No, Peter, what I'm concerned about is your backsliding. What I want to know is why you're not coming down. Why, I thought that was the real reason for the party."

"No, not quite, my dear. I'm not accompanying you."

"Why?" she demanded challengingly.

"I have changed my mind, that's all," he replied casually, although he glanced searchingly at Gideon Trevor as he spoke.

"May I ask what all this sudden change of plan means?"

Peter Lessing smiled indulgently as one would to a slightly wayward child.

"It suits me to make this little change in my plans—and that brings me to my reason for coming along to see you. I wanted to give you a little advice. If any unfortunate occurrence should take place in connection with a member of your party, keep my name right out of it. You get me?"

"I'm afraid I don't," said Barbara quietly.

"Get it clear. Keep my name right out of anything that may happen. It's your party. Everything connected with it was arranged by you. I don't figure in it at all. See?"

Barbara van Buren flared up. "See here, Peter, come right down to floor level, and just say exactly what you mean. Or I don't go to Winghamton either."

He fixed her with an intent stare. "There may be a little accident happen to-night, my dear," he told her, speaking slowly, "to a member of your party. Oh, don't worry, not while he's with you—you'll be concerned only incidentally. But if any questions are asked, remember my name is not to be mentioned as having any connection either with you or with your party. I've never heard of it."

"Accident!" Barbara exclaimed. "What sort of accident? No, No! You can't! I know you mean Robin Foster. What's he ever done to you?"

"What he's done doesn't count," Lessing answered suavely, "and don't you get frightened over the possibility of any trouble coming to you. That part has all been seen to. You'll find you've no cause to worry. Things will just happen as per contract."

"What's coming to Robin Foster? That's what I want to know. What do you mean to do to him?" cried Barbara, angrily.

Peter Lessing did not answer in words. Instead, he placed his silk hat on the back of his head, pressed it down, and continued to stare coldly at her. She endeavoured bravely to return his stare, but after a brief struggle her eyes dropped and she forced a smile.

"Oh, all right, Peter," she said resignedly, "have your own way."

"That's the spirit! And now I think you'd better run right along and wait for your friends outside. Sorry to put you to that inconvenience, my dear, but as I told you I'm not to be brought into this racket in any way whatever. I don't want any of them coming into the theater for you and finding me here."

"I'm all ready," she assented dutifully. "No—wait, I nearly forgot; it's Saturday. I want to leave a note for the stage manager."

She turned again to her dressing table and without raising her head she asked, "Gideon, didn't Hester Rogan say he was still around here?"

"Yes, she did."

"Then that's all right." Scribbling rapidly in pencil she completed a message, folded over the sheet of notepaper and addressed it.

"This is for him. Do me the small

New Paint For Amateur Decorators

Every Home Can Be House Beautiful!

There's a new revolutionary paint called Kem-Glo now on the market that means professional "home glamour" for amateur decorators. All you need is the dream and the desire. Kem-Glo will do the rest—beautifully, easily, quickly and economically.

And what is this Kem-Glo? Perhaps the best way to describe it is to say that it is a new glamour finish for kitchens, bathrooms, nurseries and finest woodwork everywhere... a rich, lustrous, easy-to-keep-clean finish that looks and washes like the baked enamel on your refrigerator.

An especially attractive feature is its easy efficiency. No longer is there any need to upset the house and the family with the irritating confusion that used to go with the job of redecorating. With ready-to-use Kem-Glo there's no mixing or mudding. No thinners, primers or undercoaters are needed (even on raw wood and plaster), and one coat covers practically all surfaces. You just open the can, pick up a brushful and watch it glide on like magic, leaving no brush marks to mar its smooth sheen. And after only three or four hours the furniture can be moved back into a model room that you can hardly wait for the neighbours to see. It's as simple as that! Just one quick easy coat and such glorious results. One quart will do the woodwork in an average sized room. Two quarts will give you a bathroom to be proud of, and all you need for the walls, woodwork and cupboards of that model kitchen you've been dreaming about is one gallon.

favour of taking it to him, Gideon you'll find him somewhere about. If he's not in his room—up the steps on the left, then first door on the right—he's sure to be somewhere backstage. Look around for him, Gideon, please, and see he gets it—its rather important. Good night. Come along one day next week," she added with a smile.

"By the way, Gideon," said Lessing interrupting his departure, "wait for me at the stage door, will you? You can stroll back with me to Charles Street. I want to go over these bonds with you before you turn in. There's going to be hell to pay for someone on Monday."

Gideon Trevor was jealously despondent. Holding Barbara's message limply in his hand he proceeded to his left in the corridor until he came to a short flight of steps. He was groping for the iron rail alongside the wall when some impulse made him stop and, in the light of the passage, examine the folded sheet of notepaper. His eyes opened wide and he gave a low, exultant whistle as he saw that the name scribbled on the outside in pencil was his own.

Quickly he unfolded the message and read it, then slipped it into his jacket pocket with an exclamation of vicious delight. He moved a few steps up the stairs and lit a cigarette, and with the lighted match carefully burned the message he had just read. His air had brightened, and under his breath he hummed softly to himself.

Swiftly retracing his steps he walked quietly back to the door of Barbara van Burden's dressing room and made his way through the network of corridors between him and the stage-door exit.

Inside her dressing-room Barbara released herself from Peter Lessing's arms.
