TO THE ELECTORS OF THIRD KING'S

Due to road conditions and the brief time allowed to campaign in this election we will be unable to contact all the voters of the District.

We recommend to your attention our very fine Party Platform which is being publicized by press and radio and strongly feel that such would answer many of our pressing problems today.

We urge every one qualified to cast their ballot on April 26th, and respectfully solicit your support.

you wonder the more you miss them.

"Have you seen him anywhere about?" Reddy asked Mrs. Reddy one day. He didn't need to explain that "him". She knew. She and Reddy had lived together so long that it sometimes seemed as if each knew what was in the mind of the other; as if in some strange manner they talked without words, or at least without sound.

"No," replied Mrs. Reddy. "I haven't seen him since Old Man Winter got here to stay. It must be that we just haven't happened to be around when he was."

"It never happened before," said Reddy.

"There has to be a first time for everything," replied Mrs. Reddy carelessly. She wasn't specially interested just then. "Perhaps he has gone with some of our feathered friends down to the Land-of-always-summer they are forever talking about," she added jokingly. Little did she guess that what she had suggested was true.

It was shortly after this that Reddy Fox began to worry. He had found signs that strangers now and then visited the Old Pasture, something that rarely had happened when Farmer Brown's boy was about. Then it was soon put to a stop when it did happen. You see, Farmer Brown's farm was what is called a wildlife sanctuary, meaning that all desirable living things thereon were safe there, including flowers, plants and trees as well as furred and feathered folk. And to make sure of this no strangers were allowed on the land without permission. Without knowing how he knew Reddy did know that whoever had been poking about in the Old Pasture had done so without permission, had been trespassing. So he began to worry.
