ELLEN'S DIARY

"These Have I Loved" --- This Is A Poem For All

"Just feel the damp!" Mack exclaimed to Granddaughter this afternoon turning his young face up to the then falling weather. "I am!" she laughed happily. "And besides, I gathered up a whole handful of it a while ago" she nodded.

"No! Where!" he questioned. "Come, I'll show you," she replied. And they raced away to a spot that still cradled it, to touch the marvel of the first snow we today received in odd flurries which fell to linger briefly or dissolve quickly and vanish.

A marigold in the flower-border bowed a bright head, late-blooming phlox too bent damply. A sparrow sheltered in a nook of eave. Winter, if not actually here, was indeed on the way.

"What are you loooking at?" Mack asked when later we stood by a window watching the fall of white between us and the dark spruces which guard the milldam below.

"The snow", we replied.

But back of it, over the months since the year had given us the joys of swelling buds and unfolding leaves, we were picturing many lovely scenes. There has been so many. Never, it seemed in retrospect, had we seen a Spring blossom so richly-every orchard tree, and wilding of woodland and hedgerow had held proudly its own wealth of bloom. We saw again, the first meadow flowers, the shy beauties of woodsy places, the summer daisies we carelessly had let slip too little noticed away. The unique sedges and other flowerings of the streamside.

Through the falling white which unseasonably weighted the last golds of some stuff-body trees, we could fancy too the summer-greens, hear the thrushes enchanting notes, see the swallows dip and soar, and our heron-friend wing in from the river and settle to his fishing in the stream below.

"We must gather in the winter apples..." and lift the Glads and the rest of the Dahlias the very first nice day" was said turning away to our work.

This week busied us on farms. The lessened hours of daylight hurried our farmers off to the fields and last harvesting. And the year wanes.

"The first Santa Claus of the season appeared today — some place away" Mack told us the news this evening. And while we hail the approach of Winter with its varied delights we nevertheless look back over the summery seasons with "secret yearnings." In them, indeed we remember in any season, and everywhere there is much to love. "These I have loved —

A shaft of silver rain.
A curling wave, a homing bird.
A fitful cloud, a leaf that surred—
A haunting old refrain.

These I have loved —
A fruit trees young white arms,
A shadow long at evenide.
The smoke of bonfire weaving high,
A smile that lifts and warms —
Oh in this world of dread unease,
May I know always things like these"

Until tomorrow — — — Diary
Goonight. . . . .
