pus, to expand and make UPEI a more attractive school. Of course this makes sense, but what of tuition fees? As far as I am concerned, the higher the fees the less appealing it is. I will certainly not be coming back next year, I'll go somewhere else instead. This is not completely due to the projected rise in next year's tuition, for I do have other reasons for planning a move - but I do have to say that this expected rise increase only helps solidify a thoughtful, semi-serious idea.

Now, if the professors wait and strike later (around March), I think it will cause the students to panic more ferociously. There will be people trying to finish courses, possibly graduate, courses will have already been paid for and much of the work will have been done, as well as a host of other concerns. This will force the students to put more pressure on the administration, which will in turn act as an aid to the professors. In other words, the professors can use the students as a battering ram if they so choose.

If they strike now then the students likely still panic, but probably not as severely as if they were to strike later on in the semester - at least it will still be possible to bail on the semester if it becomes necessary, and not lose any money or waste any time - that is if students refuse to pay tuition until the issue is settled, which I would suggest is a good idea. I will not be paying my tuition until I know it is safe to pay it, and I have heard of others doing the same. I recommend, if you can - safety first, I say to my ma'. This however, will have it's effects if done 'en mass'. If a large enough portion of the student body simply decides not to pay tuition, the administration may panic and fold to the professor's demands. I reason thus because the administration needs our student money now like a cow needs oxygen, for if they don't get it, and the professors are still on strike, administration could possibly face some interesting economic difficulties.

I would like to add, again, that this is my own reasoning, and that nothing is really certain, especially as of yet. Perhaps there will not
