EILEEN'S DIARY

Birthday Cake Magic Blow Hard & Make Wish

This morning then "at one minute after ten, to be exact" Mack, the elder son of the house across the lane, reached the milestone that marked his ninth anniversary of birth. An Old Home Week baby, he was, an Old Home Week lad he continues to be.

Taller the last year has grown him, taking him out of the tender years into a boy's estate. He is an oldish child for his age, a thoughtful chap, sunny-natured and happy and usually with a snatch of song on his lips.

During his holidays he divided his time among many interests and was never happier than when he trotted with (cousin) Gage along the millstream or was his right-hand man at some project of building, or work of the farm. He is fond of animals, interested and knowing about the farming and also welcomes the return of the school days, soon to be here.

"Make your wish, and blow him at supper, smiling at the magic of the Birthday Cake with its nine lighted candles. At the impact of a young breath they were out. "Now, you can tell us your wish" his grandfather teased. Mack shook his head. "And break the spell!" he smiled.

Today the farming once more fell into its usual orderly routine. The farmers stepped briskly along familiar paths catching up on its affairs after being in attendance this week at The Fair. They made excursions to far and farther pastures to see how the younglings of cattle had gained or lost in their absence. They crushed grain for the cows and wheat for our hatching of chicks now almost grown. And once more took up the planning which keeps the farm and farming on an even keel.

"It's good to be home" we could fancy Alex leading the way, we looked in upon him in his airy stall in the shed. "Ho, hum!" he yawned, "it's going to take me a while to get over my outing! I'm so tired-I never rest well away from home-I could sleep all day. Did you see my ribbon?" he smiled. I didn't do too badly, did I?" "You did well" we beamed. "The family's real proud of you!" we said.

And another week of August has gone to that strange country which lies beyond the River of Time! Another river was crossed at some time down the years by those memories loved ones will honor tomorrow on "Memorial Sunday" in the "Old Kirk" at the corner. Then, names, and faces, young and older will be remembered of those who walk no more the earthy paths with us, friend and kin, we have "loved long since and lost awhile."

One benefit of a loved one, thoughts bridging that river so Heaven-realm beyond writes: "Sometimes I wonder, when I pray, if meeting you, He stops to say 'I heard from your beloved today.'"

"If so, how well I know the way Your heart will lift and you will say, 'Grant her Thy peace, dear Lord, today!'" Until Monday Diary Good-night.
