camp was a mile from where he spent the night. "Camping can be fun- but not if you are a refugee," he said.

Aulach mentioned that it was the tents which made him aware that he was in a world different from one he had ever known. He pointed out that the tents in the refugee camp were simply a motely collection of rags supported by unsteady poles; spherical hovels of despair and desolation where families have lived for years- sleeping, breeding, eating and waiting, always waiting for a better social change.

Aulach's talk indicated that life in a refugee camp is of a society where people are substantially excluded from the democratic process and the ordinary commerce of a print society. More concretely, a society where people cannot express themselves freely and effectively in ways that might bring about a change.

Time and again, Aulach left no doubt about what he thought could be done. He had a keen sense of the isolation or alienation, at the centre of experience, the anguish of thinking man, who is separated by his rationality from events he perceives in the world external to his ego.

Aulach expressed fear about the future of the children in a refugee camp. he noted that there was only one school project in the camp which was part of that future. He said he visited the school which housed just seven grades. What happens afterwards? Can higher educational levels be started? Will UNHCR have the funding? Will there be qualified teachers? If ever there was a need for volunteers, the need is now.
