FRED'S VICTORY.

BY ARTHUR MELLISH.

V.

Fred seemed to become more and more estranged from his neighbors. He never went to see them, as he was so taken up with his own affairs. Gradually they ceased to come near him. They regarded him as one who "had a bee in his bonnet," and they ceased to wonder at what he called improvements. The result was that Fred's doings were unnoticed and unknown to the settlement, and he worked away in peace. His wind mill worked well. The winds blew and the tank was nearly always full. He had little trouble in conducting the water wherever he wanted it.

But Fred did not stop at his wind mill. He saw that it was necessary to get improved machinery. He found that he could manage to purchase quite a number of modern machines with what little money he had, and on the instalment plan, being able to point out to the astute agents the fact that it would not be long before he could pay the whole principal, and also the advantages to them of introducing their machines into this conservative settlement. The result was that he got his crops in rapidly, planting them by machinery instead of by hand, thus obtaining greater uniformity and a greater prospect of success in the harvesting.

The summer was one that will long be remembered in the settlement. The first part was favorable, but toward the last it seemed as if rain would never come. Day after day the sun rose and set upon the parched earth. The farmers looked anxiously in each other's faces, as each successive day of drouth passed. The winds blew as if to favor Fred, but the people seemed to have forgotten the wind mill on the ridge. Absorbed in their own affairs, they had paid no attention to his doings, as of no account; and they did not know that at every turn that unwearied wheel was pumping up cool, clear water from a never-failing spring; nor that Fred was conducting the water, now here, now there, so that on Fred's farm nothing vegetable or animal was suffering from the drouth.

The fierce heat of the sun only seemed to ripen faster and faster Fred's irrigated grain and vegetables; and the good prospects of the coming crops on the rest of the farm was owing to the fact that he had used just the right kinds of manure for his different fields—suiting each to its particular need, and following in this respect the recommendations of the college experts who had analyzed the different portions of the soil.

Finally the time for harvesting came round. All the farmers prepared to garner what poor remnant of a crop they had. Even here Fred surpassed them all. He began at out the same time they did, but instead of using the ordinary reaping machine, and binding and stooking his grain by hand, he got a self-binder to cut, bind and bundle it; and the result was that Fred had his large crop nicely housed or stacked before the others were much more than half through.

But Dave had been secretly watching all these operations. He saw bitterly that if Fred's success became apparent he would have no chance for Maria's hand. He had been cultivating Big Jim's society most assiduously and had made great advances in his favor, but he was sufficiently shrewd to perceive that Maria was kind to him, not for his own sake, but because he was Fred's brother. He had managed to find out from the innocent-minded girl what she had told Fred; and he knew that if Fred returned triumphant at the end of the year all would be over with his attempts to gain her favor and with it her farm.

Dave finally resolved on one desperate move. The English bulldog had taught him a lesson, but it was a lesson that he seemed to have forgotten, as the sequel shows.

Just when matters had arrived at the stage indicated above, when Fred had got in his crops, a very remarkable thing occurred. Fred had gone to bed, tired out with his work, but proud and happy, and hopeful, as he realized that his task was nearly completed, and that Maria was almost his. He was just closing his eyes with this beautiful dream before him, when terrible cries broke the night air, cries of a human being in agony. Springing up he rushed out and saw before him the glare of one of his stacks burning furiously on the windward side of his barn and the other stacks. As he rushed forward, shriek after shriek came from the flames, surrounded by which he saw his brother Dave pinned down by the faithful bulldog right where he had set the fire. He lay there with the flames of his own kindling roaring around him, unable to move, with the glaring eyes of the dog before him, and with its savage teeth in a fixed grip in his muscles that nothing save death could loosen.

Fred realized everything in an instant. Careless of the seething flames, he rushed forward, and, with a superhuman effort, though burned and blistered in many places, dragged his treacherous brother and the faithful dog from the vortex of flame. The dog, branded, and with the hair all singed off, did not recognize his master. It knew nothing but that it must hold on till death. Fred took up a club and killed the dog, but he could not loosen those tightly locked jaws even then.

Leaving his brother in comparative safety he gave his attention to the fire, which by the aid of the hired man and the neighbors who soon rushed in, they managed to confine it to the one stack and finally to extinguish by the copious application of water through hose from the tank, the wind mill pumping all the while. Then, exhausted by his terrible efforts, the excitement and the burns he had sustained, he fainted, and they carried him into the house and put him to bed unconscious.

When Fred recovered consciousness he found Maria with him, caring for him with tender solicitude. She told him what had happened since he fainted; how she had dressed and run there, how Dave had been found and cared for and had made a full confession. She told Fred that Dave confessed he had cut the stumping machine, had interfered with Fred's works and had finally set fire to his stack, in the hope that he would thus render him penniless. And as she repeated Dave's confession of how bravely Fred had rescued him from the pitiless fire and hardly less pitiless dog, there was such a look of tender approval in her eyes and such a tone of pride in her voice, that he felt more than repaid for all he had gone through.

VI.

Little remains to be to told. Fred honestly forgave Dave, but the farmers were indignant and would have nothing to do with him. In fact, the marks of Cain were on him, and he was glad to sell his farm and move away, where none might know the origin of these terrible scars.

Fred's improvements were the talk of the whole country; so that when, on the anniversary of the stumping frolic, he sent word through the settlement that he was going to have one, the eagerness to attend was shown by the difficulty Fred found in accommodating all who came. They were prepared to work, but they had little to do. Fred set up two machines, after the fashion of his old one, and quickly whisked a large number of stumps from the ground. He then took his wondering visitors round his farm; pointed out the different fields, told how he had manured and irrigated them, and showed his well-filled barn, as object lessons in improved methods. Then he took them to his windmill and explained how he irrigated his dry lands and watered his stock. Finally he set the lassies in raptures by turning the handle of the tap in the house and letting the water gush forth; and the lassies vowed, one and all, that they would never marry a man until he had provided a like convenience in his house.

After supper Fred arose and made a little speech. He said many pleasant things and pointed out many improvements that could be made in the settlement, emphasizing the fact that the ways of their fathers were not good enough for them, and winding up by saying that, as he had annexed one of nature's forces to pump his water, he did not think he should stop until he had annexed nature's lovliest production, a fair woman. He sat down amid uproarious cheers, which had scarce died away when the parson stepped forward, and there, before the surprised gathering, Big Jim proudly gave his daughter away to the finest man in the settlement.

Fred is now the member of legislature from that district. The farmers seem to have become very prosperous, for they wear gold watches to church. The women have lost the tired look they used to wear, and the girls sing in church the tunes practised on organs and pianos at home. All this because the settlers got some startling object lessons that thoroughly awakened them.

NO MAN ever smoked "Myrtle Navy" tobacco for a fortnight and then took to any brand in preference to it. It bears its own testimony of its qualities, and it is testimony which is always convincing. The smoker who uses it is never annoyed by getting it sometimes of good quality and sometimes of bad. The arrangements of the manufacturers for keeping its quality equal are very elaborate and complete, and are the results of many years of experience and close observation.

Nova Scotia now boasts eight daily papers by the starting of one in Digby. New Brunswick, says the Sun, has seven, four in St. John, two in Moncton and one in Fredericton. Ontario is also well supplied with daily papers, six of which are in Toronto. Of the remaining 34, four places have three, nine places two and four places one daily.

Another cruiser, the Cincinnati, was launched to-day from the Brooklyn navy-yard. A trial of 10,000 horse-power engines of the new vessel will drive the ship through the water at a 20 knot speed, which will enable her upon occasion to demonstrate the fact that she can run as well as fight. All the machinery will be ready in October, and within a few months this splendid addition to the United States navy will be in commission.
