A BOY'S GRIM ADVENTURES.

He Didn't Believe in Ghosts, But Had Several Scares.

The Phantom Dog That Excited the People of Charlottetown, and How It Was Brought to Bay.

There are people here and there who will believe in ghosts, but even among children the belief is disappearing. One of the readers of the Recorder, J. R. asked me lately:

"Have you ever seen a ghost?" "No, have you?"

"Never," was his reply. "I'd like to see one if there are such things."

"You'd get a jolly good fright if you did," I said, and he wanted to know what made me think so. He didn't believe in ghosts.

"Neither do I, but it isn't pleasant to see what some people might take for a ghost."

This remark whetted my young friend's curiosity, and he wanted to know how an experience had ever been made. Before he got through with me he had drawn out all my knowledge of ghosts. My disbelief in them dated from my earliest boyhood and yet one of the most excited frights that ever befel me was experienced after the years of manhood had been reached.

One night, while walking along a lonely road, going no thought to even such a simple thing as my own safety, I was startled by a faint light, much less to ghosts, I was startled by a misty-appearing figure that seemed to spring out of the ground close by my side. It seemed as tall as a man, and was so pale and ghastly that quick as thought I leaped back from it and scarcely knew what to think or do.

As suddenly as it appeared it disappeared, and after a little hesitation my walk was resumed, my glance turning rather anxiously in the direction where the strange figure had been.

Two or three steps brought me abreast of a hitching post painted white. In the faint light shed by the stars it looked pale and misty. Was that what had scared me? Why, it was scarcely four feet high, and the figure appeared to be nearly two feet taller than the post. The figure had disappeared as suddenly as it appeared! That was something which puzzled me until I leaped back just as before, and the hitching post disappeared also. My leap had brought a bush between me and the post, and the mystery was explained.

"But what made the hitching post appear so tall?" my young friend asked, after he had read the story.

"Partly the fact that white objects always appear to be larger than the same objects would appear to be if darker; partly because a white body looming up in the darkness always appears to be larger than it really is; but mostly because in my fright my vision was distorted. Probably the last fact would explain many of the ghost stories we hear. You have seen on quarries that pale light known as the will-o'-the-wisp, or jack-o'-lantern, and known by learned people as ignis fatuus.

In some places it is regarded as a ghost, and the people who are very much frightened by it are called 'will-o'-the-wisp' people. It is a certain gray light in the vicinity of a certain graveyard that I knew of, and yet there were people who declared that these lights were ghosts, for they had seen them grow into tall figures and assume human shape. But of course that was all nonsense. The will-o'-the-wisp you know is the flame of phosphorus rising out of the stagnant water or moist soil of marshy ground and igniting in the air. It is a very pretty sight and certainly not to be feared, except as a warning that the demon of malaria is near. Another pretty effect of phosphorus is seen at sea, and I have spent many hours gazing over the side of ships at the breaking of the ghostly flame on the waters as we rushed along. Once I sat on deck nearly the whole night watching the phosphorus light in the sea, and the phosphorus light made by the huge schools of fish that were swimming under the surface."

Among the stories drawn out by the lad who had led me into the subject was that of a phantom dog which at one time was a source of terror to many of the people of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

All kinds of strange things were told about it and mothers averted their wayward sons by telling how the typical bad boy of the town was out on the river skating one night when his mother thought he was in bed, and was frightened almost to death by this phantom dog. Its eyes were like balls of fire and it ran round and round the bay, snapping with its sharp white teeth and growling with a terrible deep howl. How that lad ever got home he could never tell, but he skated no more at night, while the rest of us were particularly careful not to go near the river at night unless there were older people with us.

Now there was plenty of ground for the stories told of the phantom dog. He had been seen many times and had been traced to his hiding place, which was under a big barn on a bluff overlooking the river. He had been fired at many times, and as some good marksmen had tried to shoot him he was believed that he had been hit more than once. Yet he did not cease his nocturnal rambles, nor was there ever found a trace of his blood on any sensible person. It is suspected that he was an evil spirit. Crows used to gather on the bluff at night to watch for him and fire at him, but he always escaped unharmed. Although regarded by many as a ghost he had a very earthy appetite, as one butcher in the town could testify, for one night he bounded into the butcher's shop, seized a large joint of meat and was off again before the butcher had time to surround him with a crowd of boys.

They were armed with guns, pistols, axes, pitchforks, clubs and all manner of other death-dealing instruments. The barn was surrounded so that the dog might not escape, and the floor was soon taken up. More than half the crowd expected something horrible to happen, but all that happened was that the dog was found, and after a vain attempt to fight his pursuers, was pinned to the ground with a pitchfork and killed. He was a big Newfoundland dog, a tramp, and his coat was so thick and so matted with tar that it was no wonder it turned the bullets fired at him.

The town breathed easier on learning that he was not a demon in the form of a dog. It was supposed that he had straggled from some ship which left him to a stray-bond's fate.

That same town was a great place for ghosts, and it held several haunted houses. In one of them a man was found in the part of his body which was supposed to be the one in which the ghost was said to appear. A woman who had lived in the house had fled to this room one day when her cloth-
