ANDREANO.

"Halt! Close up, there!"

The order rang out sharply, echoing from rock to rock, and seeming to die away in hollow murmurs up the precipitous and black sides of the hills. The little band of Italian soldiers closed up rapidly as their grizzled old captain spoke, and faced him silently with their carbines ground and the look of dull and apathetic discipline on their faces that is characteristic of their class.

"My men," said the warden, "you are in view of the hills—now, regarding them sharply from under his shaggy eyebrows, the wolf is driven to his last hair, all or nearly all of a people have been killed during the weeks that we have been following them over these dreary hills. He—the bandit, the robber, the Andreano of the hills—can't last long now. His hour is come, if we are but watchful. Up and up he has been driven, often nearly falling into our hands, yet as often escaping. Now, behold him rise the sheer, straight line of the hills, on either side are two good companies of our men; we stand in the front."

The great Andreano, our hero—the captain laughed softly in his throat—"I already as one dead. You know your orders, he is to be shot down as a dog by the men who sight him. You understand?"

A low, deep murmur went up from the men, and then in a single voice, the speaker, who stood in the front rank, giving the salute rapidly.

"But, my captain, what of the child?"

The old man turned on him fiercely—"The child? What child?"

"The soldier—a little, thin, swarthy man, with gleaming teeth shining in his brown moustache—asked the child."

"The child, my captain, he brought from the hills, he was there in the valley. The child of the woman who had loved him."

The captain, interested in spite of himself, knitted his brows and bade the soldier proceed.

"What of this child? You may speak."

"This encouraged, the little man with the gleaming teeth, turned once more, and, with many a gesture of fingers, shoulders and eyebrows, rapidly told his story.

"This but a year ago, my captain. The woman—I know not her name—had loved him in the days when he was a lad tilling the fields down there. She sat alone, her friends were dead or had left her. There was no one but the priest who could help her, and the priest was too poor. What would you?"

"With an appealing glance at his fellows and rapid shrug of his shoulders, she had been married—this woman who had loved the Andreano—and had a child, a girl child, but her mother-in-law in the sandy graveyard over against the village church, yonder, dead a year before of the fever, as 'd said to Andreano."

"He paused for a moment, spat quickly upon the ground and went on again.

"She sent a message to him up here in the hills, my captain, and he came to her. He came down in the night and saw her—came, armed to the teeth, and during all or any to touch him. And in the morning, when the sun was coming up over the hills, he had gone, and the child with him, and the woman who had loved him lay dead, with a smile on her face. That is all, my captain."

"The man staid again and drew his sword. "And the child, where is it now?" asked the captain, slowly.

"The child is with him, my captain."

"What matters it," muttered the captain. "Kill the child, K. H. H. the whole brood. Come, we waste time. Forward!"

Yet all that as the captain marched at the head of his men with knitted brows, he was silent and very thoughtful, and might almost have been thought to have been in doubt. Once or twice he shook his head slowly and muttered something beneath his breath. He, too, had heard the strange story at an earlier time—had heard how this terrible and sinistral man, with a price upon his head, had gone down into the valley—in the midst of men ready and willing to sell him—carrying his life in his hand, to see a peasant woman who had sent for him; he had heard, too, how the robber had carried the child into the hills and had carefully tended it there ever since.

It was late in the afternoon when the little company drew near the end of its quest, and with leveled carbines, crept silently amid the rocks that lay strewn about the place. Suddenly on a man—the little soldier with the gleaming teeth, who had spoken before—cried out sharply:

"See, my captain, he comes—with the child!"

It was true. Even as they looked they saw an active picture figure springing from rock to rock toward them, bearing on its shoulders a laughing, crowing, dark haired child. One hand of the man held the baby, the other grasped a carbine, and the late afternoon sun gleamed on the weapons in his belt. They saw, too, that the baby had, fastened like one of a chubby fat, a fluttering white cloth. Seeing them, the man stood quite still, waiting when, only the white cloth fluttering in the wind.

"A flag of truce!" grunted the captain, sharply calling a halt—he was too true a soldier not to regard such a sign. "What does he want, I wonder? Lower your arms there, men, there is plenty of time," he added grimly.

The robber came on again rapidly, and finally halted a little distance above them, with the baby still perched upon his shoulder. He lowered his carbine and stood there, with head upraised, looking at them defiantly.

"You have me?" he cried at last, his voice ringing out clearly through the still air. "You have tracked me up here—you, a hundred against one man. Yet, even now, you should not have taken me calmly thus, even though I stand alone—you should not have taken me thus, but for the little one."

He glanced up for a moment at the baby on his shoulder and drew one of his hands down to his lips, and then faced the soldier again, speaking directly for the first time to the officer.

"You are a brave man, captain," he said, most appealingly, "and such me do not make war on infants. What do you do with the little one my captain?"

The captain shrugged his shoulders. "The child is yours, Andreano," he said sternly. "She may die with you."

With a bound the bandit had sprung back from them, and in an instant the child was off his shoulder and behind him, and he knelt there with his carbine leveled, eagerly aiming them.

"Beasts!" he cried, "to come to you under the white flag, well knowing that I must die, and asking nothing for myself. I crave only that you should spare two innocent little ones. Know this, therefore you will not—I will kill the child rather than she shall fall beneath your murderous bows, and will do such a death as few men have died with; I do not coward souls to bear mine own to hell. Now, what say you?"

He knelt there quite calmly, with his carbine leveled, and with the child thrust behind him. But the old captain had stepped forward and raised his hand.

"Stop, Andreano!" he cried. "You are right. We do not make war on babes. This hunting down of one man is but little to my liking and it will not do it more. The child is safe."

The man rose and laid down his carbine and took up the child again.

"And the little one shall go with you down into the valley in safety?" he asked slowly.

"I have given my word. No harm shall come to the little one. Give it to me."

The robber knitted the baby's soft face passionately—once, twice, three—then moved quickly toward the captain, down the rocks, and passed the child into his arms.

"I thank you, my captain," he said, gravely. "And now you are to shoot me?"

"The other shrugged his shoulder. "So be it," he said softly. "Only cover the face of the little one that she may not see."

The captain passed the child into the hands of the little soldier of the swarthy face, and they took it quickly out of his sight. Then came an order rapidly given, and the men lay there in the valley, the echoes of those lonely hills for a moment; there was a half sob, and Andreano's course was run.

So it came about that with the sun, the men marched down into the valley again one of them bore upon a high pole the head of the notorious bandit for all the wide eye peasantry to gaze at, and the same long day, attending in front of the captain's saddle, with the captain's arm about her, a laughing, crowing, dark-haired baby.—Fidelity.

CUBAN HATRED OF SPAIN.

It Has Been Shown by Seven Rebellions. Since 1820.

In the present revolt, as in the six considerable uprisings that it has, again and again, plunged Cuba into turmoil since 1820, the Cubans and the Spaniards are arrayed against one another. Many people have very lately noticed on the distinction between the Cubans and the Spaniards in Cuba. The terms are by no means interchangeable. When a Cuban speaks of a Spaniard on his island he means a man of Spanish blood who was born in Spain. If his son are born in Cuba they are Cubans. In the course of one or two generations they become thorough Cubans in a sentiment and hate the Spaniards as bitterly as though their ancestors had lived in the same language, attending to the same churches, meeting a hundred times a day, they never commingle as one people. They scarcely ever form mutual friendships and in society, if not in business, each goes his own way. It is a disgrace for a Cuban to marry a Spaniard. Her mother will not invite a Spaniard to her home, and she herself is certain he has become a Cuban in sentiment.

The world does not present a stranger anomaly than the real one between these two kindred peoples. The explanation is not far to seek. It is found in the abnormal political relations of the two classes. The Spaniards go to Cuba to make what he can out of the island, and then, as a rule, he goes home. Most of the thousands of Spanish incomes are government officials, a few employes and soldiers, whose business it is to make all possible pickings for Spain, and incidentally to line the pockets well. The Cuban, alas, has no chance except in the industrial or commercial line. There is no field to him in the liberal professions or in the public service. If he is a steward and lucky, he may grow rich in commerce or planting, but he can take no part in public affairs, he can not worship as he pleases, he has few rights, no means of raising, and he is taxed to death. He owns real estate he pays 50 per cent. of its income into the captain-general's treasury box. If he kills an ox he must pay a dollar. It costs him $10 a year to own a carriage, or even an ox cart. He cannot sell a horse or build a wharf without paying for a government permit. The Spanish agents, from occupying general down, have almost absolute authority. Some of them have been honest men who have been honest men who have tried to deal justly. The names of many of them have been loaded with infamy. They have bought their offices with the distinct understanding that they were to use their official power as a means of acquiring wealth. No wonder a deadly hatred exists between the native Cubans and the mass of Spaniards, incomes, all of whom are regarded as being, directly or indirectly, the agents of Spain for the impoverishment and abasement.—Philadelphia Times.

The Devil Up to Date.

The popular contemporary conception of Satan is of a highly successful man of the world. It is admitted that there are shady spots in his past history, that he has done some things that he should regret, that he is a zany, a selfish, avaricious and avaricious person to have a scandalous wife. But, contrary to it is a fact that he is rich, powerful, and attractive, and intimately concerned and interested in promoting the material prosperity of the human race. He is known to be full of enterprise and public spirit, disposed to make things pleasant and powerful in carrying the enterprises with which he is concerned to a profitable issue. It is true that he is understood to be unscrupulous, but it is a fact that success excuses very much, and that when an individual has attained a position which enables him to be useful to the public it is a mistake to be over-nice about rejecting his good offices because in early life, when his necessities were more pressing, his methods or affiliations were not always such as a conscientious person could approve.

PRIVATELY DISCUSSED.

Montreal Physicians byington Largely to Prescribe a New Remedy.

MONTREAL, July 15.—There is still a good deal of talk here among all classes over the recent despatches which appeared in so many Canadian papers, relative to the cure of Mr. G. H. Kent, of Ottawa, from Bright's disease. Although the merits of the case have not been openly discussed at any of the meetings of the medical society, there has been a good deal of private conference and the impression which the report of the recovery has made is evidenced in the fact that a good many physicians have prescribed Dodd's Kidney Pills in their private practice. No higher testimony than this could be given to any remedy, the reluctance of medical men to admit any good in proprietary medicines being well known.
