ADAM BEDE.

CHAPTER IV.

Lisbeth, though disposed always to take the negative side in her conversations with Seth, had a vague sense that there was some comfort and safety in the fact of his piety, and that it somehow relieved her of any spiritual transactions on her own behalf.

So the mother and son knelt down together, and Seth prayed for the poor wandering father, and for those who were sorrowing for him at home. And when he came to the petition that Adam might never be called to set up his tent in a far country, but that his mother might be cheered and comforted by his presence all the days of her pilgrimage, Lisbeth's ready tears flowed again, and she wept aloud.

When they rose from their knees, Seth went to Adam again, and said, 'Will you lie down for an hour or two and let me go on the while?'

'No, Seth, no. Make mother go to bed, and go thyself.'

Meantime Lisbeth had dried her eyes, and now followed Seth, holding some thing in her hands. It was the brown-and-yellow platter, containing the baked potatoes with the gravy in them, and bits of meat which she had cut and mixed among them. Those were dear times, when wheaten bread and fresh meat were delicacies to working people. She set the dish down rather timidly on the bench by Adam's side, and said, 'Thee canst pick a bit while thee'rt workin'. I'll bring thee another drop of water.'

'Ay, mother, do,' said Adam, kindly, 'I'm getting very thirsty.'

In half an hour all was quiet; no sound was to be heard in the house but the loud ticking of the old day-clock, and the ringing of Adam's tools. The night was very still; when Adam opened the door to look out at twelve o'clock, the only motion seemed to be in the glowing, twinkling stars; every blade of grass was asleep.

Bodily haste and exertion usually leave our thoughts very much at the mercy of our feelings and imagination; and it was so to-night with Adam. While his muscles were working lustily, his mind seemed as passive as a spectator at a diorama; scenes of the sad past, and probably sad future, floating before him, and giving place one to the other in succession.

He saw how it would be to-morrow morning, when he had carried the coffin to Broxt'n, and was at home again, having his breakfast; his father, perhaps, would come in, ashamed to meet his son's glance—would sit down, looking older and more tottering than he had done the morning before, and hang down his head, examining the floor-quarries; while Lisbeth would ask him how he supposed the coffin had been got ready, that he had slinked off and left undone, for Lisbeth was always the one to utter the first word of reproach, although she cried at Adam's severity toward his father.

'So it will go on, worsening and worsening,' thought Adam, 'there's no slipping up hill again, and no standing still when once you've begun to slip down.' And then the day came back to him when he was a little fellow, and used to run by his father's side, proud to be taken out to work, and prouder still to hear his father boasting to his fellow-workmen how the little chap had an uncommon notion of carpentering. 'What a fine, active fellow his father was then! When people asked Adam whose little lad he was? he had a sense of distinction as he answered, 'I'm Thias Bede's lad,'—and was quite sure everybody knew Thias Bede; didn't he make the wonderful pigeon-house at Broxt'n paragonage? Those were happy days, especially when Seth, who was three years the younger, began to go out working too, and Adam began to be a teacher as well as a learner. But then came the days of sadness, when Adam was some way on in his teens, and Thias began to loiter at the public-houses, and Lisbeth began to cry at home, and to pour forth her plaints in the hearing of her sons. Adam remembered well the night of shame and anguish when he first saw his father quite wild and foolish, shouting a song out fitfully among his drunken companions at the "Wagon Overthrown." He had run away once when he was only eighteen, making his escape in the morning twilight with a little blue bundle over his shoulder, and his "mensuration book" in his pocket, and saying to himself very decidedly that he could bear the vexations of home no longer—he would go and seek his fortune, setting up his stick at the cross-ways and bending his steps the way it fell. But by the time he got to Stoniton, the thought of his mother and Seth, left behind to endure every thing without him, became too importunate, and his resolution failed him. He came back the next day, but the misery and terror his mother had gone through in those days, had haunted her ever since.

'No!' Adam said to himself to-night, 'that must never happen again. It 'ud make a poor balance when my doings are cast up at the last, if my poor mother stood o' the wrong side. My back's broad enough; I should be no better than a coward to go away and leave the troubles to be borne by them as aren't half so able. They that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of those that are weak, and not to plose themselves. There's a text wants no candle to show't; it shines by its own light. It's plain enough you get into the wrong road i' this life if you run after this and that only for the sake o' making things easy and pleasant to yourself. A pig may poke his nose into the trough and think o' nothing outside it; but if you've got a man's heart and soul in you, you can't be easy a-making your own bed an' leaving the rest to lie on the stones. Nay, nay, I'll never slip my neck out o' the yoke, and leave the load to be drawn by the weak 'uns. Father's a sore cross to me, an's likely to be for many a long year to come. What then? I've got health, and the limbs, and the sperrit to bear it.'

At this moment a smart rap, as if with a willow wand, was given at the house door, and Gyp, instead of barking, as might have been expected, gave a loud howl. Adam, very much startled, went at once to the door and opened it. Nothing was there: all was still, as when he opened it an hour before; the leaves were motionless, and the light of the stars showed the placid fields on both sides of the brook quite empty of visible life. Adam walked round the house, and still saw nothing except a rat which darted into the woodshed as he passed. He went in again, wondering; the sound was so peculiar that, the moment he heard it, it called up the image of the willow wand striking the door. He could not help a little shudder as he remembered how often his mother had told him of just such a sound coming as a sign when some one was dying. Adam was not a man to be gratuitously superstitious; but he had the blood of the peasant in him as well as of the artisan, and a peasant can no more help believing in a traditional superstition than a horse can help trembling when he sees a camel. Besides, he had that mental combination which is at once humble in the region of mystery, and keen in the region of knowledge; it was the depth of his reverence quite as much as his hard common sense, which gave him his disinclination to doctrinal religion, and he often checked Seth's argumentative spiritualism by saying, 'Eh, it's a big mystery; thee know'st but little about it.' And so it happened that Adam was at once penetrating and credulous. If a new building had fallen down, and he had been told that this was a Divine judgment, he would have said, 'May be; but the bearing o' the roof and walls wasn't right, else it wouldn't ha' come down'; yet he believed in dreams and prognostics, and you see he shuddered at the idea of the stroke with the willow wand.

Public Sentiment in Germany.

One of the most significant signs of the trend of public sentiment in Germany is given in the result of the recent elections to the Reichstag. Fully 650,000 votes were polled by the socialists, and an investigation since ordered by the government goes to show that the main body of this vote came from the class of moderate men, who intend in this way to protest against the severe restrictive laws of the government. The German people are among the most intelligent of European populations, and, despite all their love for the fatherland and the Emperor William cannot be made to endure anything that looks like absolutism in government. It is probable that the strong expression of opinion indicated at the polls will have the result of doing away with the more obnoxious provisions of the repressive laws.

A fatal disease prevails in portions of Virginia and Kentucky, and nearly 300 deaths are reported therefrom, which is an alarming percentage of population. The disease is attributed to the prevalence of mineral poison in drouth dried waters, and the patient usually dies or recovers within a week. In some cases death ensues within twenty-four hours or even sooner. The country is entirely demoralized and business interests neglected. Cattle are also dying in the same section. Rain has been falling during the past two days, and it is probable that the drouth is now ended.

A lady sends the following: A beautiful thought came from my little boy of 8 years this evening. We were watching our lovely sunset, and afterwards the stars made their appearance one by one, until there was a myriad of bright, twinkling orbs. He said: 'Mamma, don't you suppose that God has bored lots of holes in the sky so that we can just see how beautiful Heaven is on the other side, and don't you guess that it is the angels floating by them that makes them look as though they were winking?'

It is said that Thurlow Weed was naturally possessed of little strength of memory, and to overcome the defect used nightly to spend fifteen minutes in recalling the events of the day. He repeated as far as possible the letters and articles he had written and the conversations he had held. By this discipline he acquired an extraordinary memorizing skill.

In the Congo conference the British commissioner, after Bismarck's opening address maintained that surveillance over the Niger river was England's duty and privilege, and expected it would not be a subject of discussion. Portugal has drawn up a memorandum asserting her rights to the Congo territory.

The German firm that purchased 100 Krupp guns, and was not allowed by the Egyptian authorities to export them, has begun a suit against the Egyptian government for $140,000.

Lord Northbrook advises that Great Britain should bear the expenses of the Egyptian occupation.

A CARD.—To all who are suffering from errors and indications of youth, nervous weakness, early decay, loss of manhood, &c., I will send a recipe that will cure you, FREE OF CHARGE.
