

HERE IT IS. THE FIRST issue of the Panther Post. It is an exciting time for us, young students.

A whole new paper here to tell you exactly what is happening in and around the school.

Try to be optimistic.

The whole issue has been one of constant questioning. Many wonder what the point of changing the name of a newspaper when it is actually the content that needs changing. True, true.

But take note: we have changed the content. Hopefully you feel it to be for the better, I know we do. Keep an open mind about the new newspaper name. We are not looking to place a veil over the follies of the past, we are hoping to open a window for the future.

The new name was voted for by you, the students, in a democratically held referendum on what you feel would be the best next step for your worthy newspaper.

I have heard multiple opinions on said decision. Many view the new name as a step backwards. One opinion found in an issue by our friends at the Semantic said the Cadre is a perfectly fine name, and should remain so. I do not disagree with these sentiments, but I do wish people would realize anything this paper does is an attempt to better us.

The option of leaving the name as the Cadre was available, and you still chose the name on the front page of the paper you are now reading.

So rejoice, dear students, this is democracy at its best.

Many of you may still question, and will continue to question, the choice of changing the name, but bear in mind, it is not without good cause.

Think of it as a fresh start.

In academic terms, you do not give the exact same paper back after being given the opportunity for a re-write. At least, I would hope not. You aim to improve on the problems found in the previous writing. We aim to do the same.

The new name is a fresh start. A chance to renew a recalcitrant paper that has in the past been more pugnacious than informative.

A chance to breath life into a paper that has allowed itself to choke to death.

This is the future, dear students.

Welcome to the age of the Panther Post.
