Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN CHARLES LAMB AS A POET

We commonly think of Lamb as an essayist or a letter writer, forgetting that he was a poet as well. Some of his letters are included in anthologies of letters. His poetry too has been similarly honored.

FAIRGRIEVE, in his Golden Treasury includes three from Lamb, and David Main, in his Treasury of English Sonnets has no less than five by Lamb. Then Dr. Willis Knight in his Victorian Anthology gives considerable space to him—the first four being from his pen.

IT may not be amiss to mention two or three of these poems. The first is a sonnet, enclosed in a letter to Bernard Barton, of the date Sept., 1822. Lamb liked the sonnet form of poetic expression. "This one is about the drudgery of work at the desk, where he had spent so much of his life. Here are a few lines:

"Who first invented work, and bound the free And holy day-rejoicing spirit down To the ever haunting importunity Of business in the green field, and in the town— To plough, loom, anvil, spade—and oh! the most sad To the dry drudgery at the desk's dead wood?"

The answer is "Sabbathless Satan." In a letter to the Wordsworths Sep. 28, 1805 he says "Hang work! it is the invention of the old Teaser, whose interference doomed Adam to an apron and set him a-hoeing." In Oct. 1815 he breaks out thus: "Accursed damned desks, trade, commerce, business." Inventions he calls them of Sabbathless restless Satan. "A curse relieves one; do you ever try it?" To Thomas Manning he writes on May 28, 1819: "This dead everlasting dead desk—how it weighs the spirit of a gentleman down. This dead wood of the desk instead of your living trees." These selections give some idea of the atmosphere in which the above sonnet was written.

The lyric to a child dying as soon as it was born is most moving. The little child was that of Thomas Hood. He refers to the letter to Hood, May, 1827. This poem goes to the heart. He says of the little dead girl: "She did but open an eye and put A clear beam forth, then straight upshut For the long dark."

This puts one in mind of Walt Whitman's line about a child—"The little child that peeped in at the door, and then drew back and was never seen again." The little one that took a look at life and withdrew.

Lamb in the poem referred to asks: "Who can show What thy short visit meant, or know What thy errand here below?" Then he pleads that the toys that were intended to amuse the little girl had she lived, be put in the coffin with her: "Let not one be missing; nurse, See them laid upon the hearse. Of infant slain by doom perverse."

Other poems worth mentioning are the well-known "Old Familiar Faces". There is a sort of sob about these verses. He thinks of the old days and his bosom cronies with whom he took class, he refers to his one love affair and every verse calls up "the old familiar faces."

Then there is the little poem for the album of Lucy Barton, the daughter of one of his correspondents Bernard Barton. These verses are as tender as a violet.

The one to Charles Lloyd, a friend is also very fine. And of course there is the one to his mother. A few lines will make a fitting close to this paper. This was written one morning, the anniversary of her death. He implores God thus: "Forgive me O my Maker! In a mood of grief I sin almost In sometimes brooding on the days long past. And from the grave of time wishing them back. Days of a mother's fondness to her child. Her little one." These are but a few samples to show that Charles Lamb has a place in English poetry.

RETURNED FROM ENGLAND—Among the passengers aboard the Cynthia from Liverpool, England to Quebec, was Mrs. Phoebe MacKinnon and her three small children, Andrew, Robbie and Eleanor of Clyde River. The quartet were on a three month visit to Mrs. MacKinnon's parents, the Rev. Canon Exham and Mrs. Exham of Litchfield. Mr. MacKinnon motored to Moncton to meet his wife and children. The party arrived at their home at Clyde River on September 2nd.

THE THORPE AFFAIR By Phillip Lesly Terry pulled the car to the curb before the Elm Street Apartment Hotel, pressed his foot on the brake, and turned to the girl. "Here we..." he began. But she was already out of the car. She looked at him quickly, then ran across the sidewalk into the building. Terry sat unmoving for a moment, surprised. Then he hurriedly opened the door, clumsy in his haste, crawled out and rushed to the hotel door. He waited impatiently for the swinging doors to slow enough for him to get in, pushed his way through and rushed into the lobby. He looked about anxiously. There were several women in sight, but none of them was she. He rushed to the elevators but none was waiting open. The stairway too, was deserted. He opened the door to the freight elevator and discovered that the car was high up in the building. With jaw set hard he approached the desk clerk to ask her room number, then caught himself. He cursed mentally at his failure to learn her name. Maybe, he told himself, she wasn't so dumb after all. For a reporter who was supposed to know all the tricks, he had certainly been fooled.

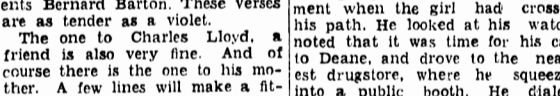

The mystery that surrounded the girl was no nearer solution now than it had been when he met her; and accompanying circumstances had added to the intrigue. He'd find out more about her, he promised himself; there was more than one trick in his bag. With a smile of anticipation he went out to his car.

CHAPTER II In the car, Terry slumped behind the wheel and pondered. He remembered, suddenly that he had been going out to cover an assignment when the girl had crossed his path. He looked at his watch, noted that it was time for his call to Deane, and drove to the nearest drugstore, where he squeezed into a public booth. He dialed, waited, then snapped: "City desk" into the transmitter. "Deane, this is just your black-

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of our darling daughter and sister, Gwendolyn Fall, who passed away September 9th, 1946.

Five years have passed since that sad day, When one we loved was called away. The blow was great, the shock severe, We little thought her death was near.

Friends may think we have forgotten, When at times they see us smile. But they little know the heartache Our smile hides all the while.

If all the world was ours to give We'd give it yes and more. To see the face of one we loved, Come smiling through the door.

Ever Remembered by Mother, Dad, Sisters and Brothers.
